

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

INTRODUCTION.

THE defeat of the Spanish Armada in 1588 has been rightly described by Sir Edward Creasy as one of the decisive battles of the world, speaking of it as one continued battle lasting for nine days, rather than as a succession of battles. It marks alike the approaching downfall of Spain and the rise of England as a great maritime power. England had indeed always believed in her naval power, had always claimed the sovereignty of the Narrow Seas ; and, more than two hundred years before Elizabeth came to the throne, Edward III. had testified to his sense of its importance by ordering a gold coinage bearing the device which is now reproduced on the title page and cover of this volume, a device showing the armed strength and sovereignty of England based on the sea. It was no mere coincidence which led to the adoption of such a device in 1344, four years after the most bloody battle and decisive victory of western war—the battle of Sluys—which, by giving England the command of the sea, determined the course of the great war which followed ; determined that Crécy and Poitiers should be fought on French soil, not on English ; determined that the English—not the French—armies should consist of trained soldiers; that the French armies—not the English—should consist of raw levies of half-armed peasants.

The device thus adopted was continued by Edward's successors, and was still in use under Elizabeth, telling to those who could understand it that the might and majesty of England rested on her navy. That this was fully proved in the summer of 1588 is a familiar story, but the following pages show that few indeed of her statesmen, or warriors, or seamen, had realised the fact. They could believe that the fleet of England was capable of withstanding that of Spain; that the armada, of itself, was not a thing to be feared; but they never quite succeeded in getting rid of the notion that the Duke of Parma's army was still terrible. Wynter, indeed, with nigh fifty years' experience at sea, and memories of former expeditions to guide him, was sure that the enemy must find very great difficulty in the transport of the army, and that if the squadron in the Narrow Seas was kept up at its actual strength, 'the Prince's forces, being no other than that which he hath in Flanders at this time (20th of June), dare not come to the seas' (p. 214). Wynter's opinion is eminently practical. It was supposed that Parma might attempt a landing at Sheppey, Harwich or Yarmouth, places where 'a small charge will make a sufficient strength to withstand any sudden attempt; but in these princely actions a man cannot be too provident; and no wisdom were it to put things to an even balance, when more weight may be added' (ib.).

Drake's experience was, in its nature, altogether different from Wynter's. His fighting had been brisker, more adventurous, less systematic. He had seen less of fleets, little of the transport of troops. He had made attacks and found the enemy helpless to prevent him. It would almost seem that he imagined Parma might try to do for London what he himself had done for Nombre de Dios or Cartagena. And yet he fully realised the difficulties in Parma's way. He must have a spring tide to bring his ships out ; he must have fair weather, his ships being small and pestered with soldiers ; and if the Duke of Medina should return with the fleet, 'he is like, God willing, to have unquiet rest.' 'We ought,' he adds, 'much more to have regard unto the Duke of Parma and his soldiers, than to the Duke of Sidonia and his ships. . . . My opinion is that the Duke of Parma should be vigilantly looked upon for these twenty days, although the army of Spain return not this way ; for of them I have no great doubt ; although there be great cause for us all to watch carefully' (vol. ii.—Drake to Walsyngham, August 23). That in the face of a strong squadron Parma could not cross he quite well understood ; but not so well that—with Medina-Sidonia defeated and fled—he could not attempt to do so ; that the merest threat of interference was sufficient to prevent him.

But when even Drake did not see this clearly, it is not strange that the action of the fleet was for long misunderstood, and that the failure of the Spaniards should have been represented—as it often is even now—as due to a Heaven-sent storm.

Flavit Deus et dissipati sunt was accepted as at once a true and pious explanation of the whole thing. It was, too, a flattering and economical belief. We were—it has been argued—a nation peculiarly dear to the Almighty, and He showed His favour by raising a storm to overwhelm our enemy when the odds against us were most terrible.

From the religious point of view such a representation is childish ; from the historical it is false. False, because the Spanish fleet, after being hounded up Channel, had sustained a crushing defeat from the English, a defeat in which they lost many ships and thousands of men before they fled to the north ; a defeat so terrible that nothing could induce them to turn on their pursuers ; a defeat which forced them to a headlong flight into the unknown dangers of the northern seas, rather than face the more certain and now known danger of the English shot. Childish, because in affairs of State Providence works by recognised means, and gives the victory not by disturbing the course of nature and nature's laws, but by giving the favoured nation wise and prudent commanders, skilful and able warriors ; by teaching their hands to war and their fingers to fight.

But, in fact, much of the nonsense that has been talked grew out of the attempt, not unsuccessfully made, to represent the war as religious ; to describe it as a species of crusade instigated by the Pope, in order to bring heretical England once more into the fold of the true Church. In reality nothing can be more inaccurate. It is, indeed, quite certain that religious bitterness was imported into the quarrel ; but the war had its origin in two perfectly clear and wholly mundane causes.

The first and chief of these was the exclusive commercial policy adopted and enforced by the Spanish Government in respect of its West Indian and American settlements. That such a policy should give rise to smuggling, that the smuggling should be met by violent repression, and that, again, by bloody reprisals, was all a matter of course. Now amongst the smugglers were two men—kinsmen—who by force of character, by genius curiously well adapted to the circumstances of the age, and by undaunted courage, were destined to achieve a foremost place in the roll-call of English seamen. Their names were John Hawkyns and Francis Drake. In September 1568 these two men, with some few companions and a little squadron of five vessels, whilst carrying on a lucrative though illicit traffic with the Spanish settlements, were caught, in the harbour of San Juan de Lua, by a vastly superior Spanish force and were overwhelmed. Hawkyns and Drake, in two of the smallest vessels, alone escaped. Ordinary men, under the circumstances, would have digested their loss as they best might; but these, not being ordinary men, determined by fair means or foul to exact compensation for the injury which they conceived had been done them. Hawkyns, with the cunning as well as the courage of the fox, entered into a simulated negotiation to hand over a considerable part of the navy of England to King Philip, on condition of having the men who had been taken prisoners set free, and of receiving money compensation for his loss. The intrigue forms a curious episode in the history of the Ridolfi plot in 1571. Drake, on the other hand—a man of bolder and more generous character—finding compensation not forthcoming, resolved to seek it for himself; and after some preliminary cruises, made that wonderful and adventurous voyage in which, with a mere handful of men, he took Nombre de Dios, sacked Venta Cruz, captured a convoy of mules laden with silver, and returned home with more treasure than any one ship had previously brought to England. His achievement was to be speedily surpassed, but by himself. Four years afterwards he started on a voyage for the South Sea, and, capturing Spanish ships by the score and Spanish towns by the dozen, put a girdle round about the earth, and returned to England, again bringing back an enormous quantity of treasure, to the amount, it was said, of a million and a half sterling.

The outcry of the friends of Spain was very loud. Drake, they said, was a pirate, and unless he was punished, war was inevitable. Elizabeth had probably made up her mind that, in any case, war was very likely. She positively and in the plainest language refused to admit the Spanish claim to the whole of the islands and continent of America. She herself sympathised, she knew that all England sympathised, with Drake, and held his achievements to be not only heroic but lawful. Besides, she had got the money; and to return money which she had once clutched was to her a constitutional impossibility. She kept the money and she knighted Drake. Spaniards naturally took a very different view of Drake's conduct. It is quite certain that the King of Spain, and not only the King, but every one of his subjects, considered Drake as a pirate who ought to have been hanged, and maintained that the approval and support which he received from the English crown was a distinct and valid reason for an appeal to arms.

The other and perhaps equally valid reason was the countenance and assistance which had been given by the English to the King's rebellious subjects in the Low Countries ; and though many English, whether for pay or principle, had served in the Spanish armies against the Dutch, it was not doubted that the general opinion of England and of England's Queen was in favour of the rebels. There were, of course, many other grounds of ill-will, beginning, it may be, with Elizabeth's refusal to marry Philip. The quarrel had been growing all along : Elizabeth had seized the Duke of Alva's treasure ; had allowed Dutch privateers to shelter in English harbours ; had supported the claimant to the crown of Portugal. Philip, on the other hand, had stirred up and fomented rebellion in Ireland, and had been a party to many plots in England—plots against the Queen's sovereignty, plots against the Queen's life. He had behaved with the utmost insolence to the Queen's ambassador, and had placed many offensive restrictions on the commercial intercourse of the two nations and on English residents in Spain.

It was said, too, and universally believed, that unoffending English subjects, visiting Spain on their lawful occasions, were on the most shadowy pretexts seized by the Inquisition, imprisoned, tortured, and burnt at the stake. That these stories had a very great effect on popular opinion is certain : it is as certain that they were much exaggerated and frequently grossly misrepresented. Englishmen in Spain were, of course, subject to Spanish laws ; and if they went to Spain for their own profit they were bound to submit to such laws as were there in force ; but the known instances of Englishmen residing for many years at the Spanish ports, and carrying on a lucrative business there, are too numerous to permit us to believe that the English, as such, were subject to any undue and irregular oppression ; though as aliens in blood, in customs, and in religion, they were not looked on with much favour. On the other hand, transgressors met with little consideration. On both sides sharp measure had been dealt out to pirates : the hanging of Oxenham and his fellows was a smaller analogue of the butchery at Smerwick, and both executions were quite in accordance with the custom of the age. Even prisoners in recognised war might be, and not uncommonly were, put to death, if they were judged not worth keeping for a ransom. It will be seen that, in the surrender of the Nuestra Señora del Rosario, it was especially stipulated that the lives of the prisoners were to be spared, and that when the ship was taken to Torbay the sheriff of Devon thought it a pity that the men had not 'been made water spaniels' (vol. ii.—Don Pedro to the King, August 21 ; Cary to Walsingham, August 29). In the case of the San Mateo, no conditions were made, and whilst 'the best sort were saved, the rest were cast overboard and slain' (vol. ii.—Borlas to Walsyngham, August 3). Of course, when prisoners were a source of danger, there was no hesitation. The action of Henry V. at Agincourt was a commonplace of mediæval war, and in 1588 a similar measure was meted out to the Spaniards who were thrown, naked and destitute, on the coast of Ireland.

There would thus, according to the ideas and practice of the age, have been nothing out of the way in summarily slaying the men who, in 1568, were captured at San Juan de Lua, or were afterwards put on shore by Hawkyns. In Spanish law, as indeed in English law, smugglers forcibly resisting the king's authority were pirates, and might be put to death without more ado. It is probable that many of them were so put to death, but more seem to have been enslaved; and in after years some few returned to England with stories of Spanish tyranny and Spanish cruelty which made a great impression on their countrymen. Prisons in the sixteenth century were nowhere luxurious abodes, and Spanish prisons are not likely to have been better than those of other nations. Howard, the philanthropist, has left a description of English prisons two hundred years later, when they were presumably less barbarous than in the days of Queen Elizabeth; and from this we may understand that, without any special malice or design on the part of the Spaniards, Englishmen, and especially Englishmen of a respectable position—merchants, or masters of merchant-ships—who had the misfortune to get into a Spanish prison, did experience grievous sufferings.

Nor were the horrors of the prison-house necessarily the worst part of their lot. The Spaniards, as also the French and Italians, had no scruples about making their prisoners useful ; and an able-bodied man was as likely as not to find himself helping to tug an oar in one of the king's galleys, without the slightest regard paid to his personal dignity or his nationality, or the cause of his imprisonment (cf. p. 181).

That many Englishmen did thus rot in Spanish dungeons, or break their hearts in Spanish galleys, is very well established, but the reason why is not so clear. As a general rule it is attributed to the Inquisition, and is assumed to have been on a charge of heresy. It seems, however, not impossible that there has always been a confusion of names. Inquisicion means equally the Inquisition and a judicial inquiry : inquisidor might be an inquisitor, or a magistrate, or, in the armada, the provost-marshal ; and men reported to be lingering in the dungeons of the Inquisition may have been in some other and perhaps fouler prison on a charge of smuggling or piracy, brawling or contempt of court. And magistrates were not immaculate, even in England. Even in England alleged criminals were sometimes allowed to lie for months without a hearing and when heard, were sometimes wrongfully condemned. It is not to be supposed that similar blunders—blunders of ignorance, carelessness or prejudice—did not occur in Spain.

Still there is no doubt that many fell into the hands of the Inquisition, as we understand the word, the Holy Office. Always on the watch to detect and punish heresy, which, in Spain, was held to be as dangerous to the State as popery was in England, the Holy Office did not professedly exercise jurisdiction over foreigners who kept their religious opinions to themselves; but the man who openly and noisily preached his false doctrine or denounced the dogmas of the Church, be he Englishman or Spaniard, was arrested with as little ceremony as ever was a popish recusant in England, and racked, imprisoned, or put to death, even as if he had been a Mayne, a Sherwood, or a Campion. When we recollect the atrocities that were practised in England against the Papists under Elizabeth, or, a hundred years later, in Scotland, against the Covenanters under Charles II.; that Burghley advocated the use of the rack, and that the burning of women as witches was common even in the seventeenth century, we may allow that the Spanish Inquisition, abominable institution as it was, and aggravated by political conditions and the death-struggle with the Moors, was a disease of the age, and common alike to Papist and to Protestant.

But as to the wrongs and sufferings of English prisoners in Spain, a point which does not seem to have been duly considered is that we seldom have any account of them except that given by the men themselves. Miles Philips, for instance, and Job Hortop, two of the men who were landed by Hawkyns after the rout at San Juan de Lua, are credible witnesses when they describe how the Spaniards 'hung them up by the arms upon high posts, until the blood burst out of their finger ends,' and punished them severely for attempting to escape, breaking out of prison, or conspiring to seize the ship. We know from such narratives as that of Captain O'Brien, how, two hundred years later, the French treated prisoners of war who committed such offences; and according to Garneray,¹ who professes to write from personal experience, the life of a French prisoner on board a hulk at Portsmouth was wretched beyond the power of words. But when these two men—smugglers and pirates in the eye of Spanish law—describe themselves and their mates as being brought before the Inquisitors, and as being racked, burnt, or imprisoned because they could not say the Lord's Prayer in Latin, or give satisfactory answers to abstruse questions on the Real Presence, their statements require corroboration.²

So, too, the story of Robert Tomson, who, after residing for several years in Spain and Mexico, was, he says, dragged before the Inquisition and sentenced to a term of imprisonment for entering on a religious argument at a supper party, and denouncing images, pictures, and the invocation of saints before a mixed company. During a long residence in Spain, Tomson must have outwardly conformed to the Catholic religion; as he afterwards married a Spanish woman, he must have again conformed; so that his untimely display of Protestant zeal was a relapse such as the Inquisition always judged severely, and for which it would have inflicted a heavier punishment than three years in prison, with permission to marry a rich heiress at the end of the time. The story is therefore suspicious, and—as the other—needs corroboration.³

It is not often possible to subject such stories to a critical examination ; but the case of Thomas Cely, which has been put prominently forward, admits and is deserving of a fuller discussion. In 1575 (vol. ii. App. A.), Dorothy, the wife of one Thomas Cely, a Bristol trader, petitioned the Council, setting forth that 'her husband upon most vile, slanderous, spiteful, malicious, and most villainous words uttered against the Queen's Majesty's own person by a certain subject of the King of Spain, not being able to suffer the same, did flee upon the same slanderous person and gave him a blow ; hereupon her said husband, no other offence in respect of their religion there committed, was secretly accused to the Inquisidores of the Holy House and so committed to most vile prison, and there hath remained now three whole years in miserable state with cruel torments.'

Dorothy Cely certainly believed that her husband was in the dungeons of the Inquisition, and petitioned the Lords of the Council and the Queen to institute reprisals specially directed against foreign Papists. Mr. Froude, too, accepting the petition as sufficient authority, has lately repeated and emphasised the narrative. He says :—

'Thomas Cely, a merchant of Bristol, hearing a Spaniard in a Spanish port utter foul and slanderous charges against the Queen's character, knocked him down. To knock a man down for telling lies about Elizabeth might be a breach of the peace, but it had not yet been declared heresy. The Holy Office,

however, seized Cely, threw him into a dungeon, and kept him starving there for three years, at the end of which he contrived to make his condition known in England.'¹ He thinks, however, that it was to no purpose, and that Cely was 'one of the many hundred English sailors who rotted away in the dungeons of the Inquisition, or were burnt to please the rabble of Valladolid.'²

Whether the fate of the 'many hundred English sailors' rests on a more solid foundation than that of Cely does not appear; but Cely lived to command a ship against the Armada, to write the quaint letter (p. 262), to plunder the Spanish prisoners (vol. ii. Index), and to be granted a pension of 30*l.* a year (May 5, 1590). He was still alive and in good health in July 1591.

But Cely's letter is specially interesting from the naïve confession of the cause of his punishment, which was very different from that alleged in the petition, or the paraphrase of it: to knock a man down in a Spanish port, presumably on the wharf, for uttering foul and slanderous charges against the Queen's character can scarcely be considered the same thing as 'striking their secretary as I was before the Inquisidores, they sitting in judgment.' It might be well, before speaking too strongly of the cruelty to which Cely was subjected, to ask what would have been the fate of a foreign sailor in England who, in open court, struck the judge's secretary? As to why Cely was, in the first instance, before the magistrates or Inquisidores, or whether the Holy Office had anything to do with the matter, there is no evidence. It may have been for smuggling, or for brawling, or possibly for contempt shown to the Host in its passage along the street.

Much more might be said on this moot point ; but political affairs commonly depend on belief rather than on fact, and, whatever the actual truth, it appears fairly certain that, to the English, the real or supposed cruelties of the Inquisition were a principal cause of the very strong feeling against the Spaniards and Papists ; whilst, to the Spaniards, the aggressions of the English smugglers and pirates, and the assistance rendered by the English to Dutch rebels, were direct causes of the war. The breach was by no means a one-sided one, and though we are naturally accustomed to lay most stress on our own grievances, real and sentimental, we cannot but admit that the Spaniards also had suffered very substantial injuries. What brought matters to a climax were the embargo laid on English shipping in Spain in May 1585, and the dread of Spain, which could now only be considered as a hostile power, obtaining the command of the Dutch ports.¹

The war between the two countries, which avowedly began in 1585, anticipated, in a very curious manner, the lines of the war of the French Revolution two centuries later. In both cases the immediate cause of war was the dread of a hostile power fortifying itself in the sea-ports of the Netherlands ; to prevent this a levy of men was ordered ; the newly-raised army was sent abroad under an incompetent general, whose sole title to command was royal favour—it matters little whether he was called Earl of Leicester or Duke of York—and the result was ignominious failure. But meantime the English fleet swept the West Indies, and Drake's expedition of 1585–6 may be considered the precursor and prototype of Jervis's campaign of 1794. It will be seen that this correspondence was not only in the commencement of the wars, but also in their more advanced stages; that the flat-bottomed boats at Dunkirk were imitated by those at Boulogne; and that the destruction of the enemy's ships at Cadiz in 1596 presents a very exact analogy to the final overthrow of Bonaparte's schemes at Trafalgar.

Drake's brilliant raid through the West Indies determined Philip on a decided course. For the past fifteen years the invasion of England had been mooted, as a thing desirable and not impossible. It had been proposed by the Duke of Alva in 1569, after the seizure of his treasure. It had been spoken of in 1579, after the exploits of Norreys in the Low Countries had rendered the services of the English volunteers notorious; and in 1583, after his victory over Strozzi and his scratch fleet at Terceira, the Marquis of Santa Cruz had urged it as a necessary step towards the reduction of the rebellious Netherlands.¹ The Duke of Parma had written to the same effect, repeating that English soldiers were of little count in presence of the ¹ La Armada Invencible, por el Capitan de Navío C. Fernandez Duro, i. 241. In the book here referred to, Captain Duro has done, from the Spanish point of view, what is now attempted, in the following pages, from the English. The two works are, in a measure, complementary of each other, and both must be studied for a full understanding of the events of the year.

Spanish veterans, and adding a statement, which seems to have obtained general credence among the Spaniards, that the English ships at Terceira had been the first to fly ; had, in fact, played a part somewhat resembling that of the Egyptian ships at Actium. It is quite possible that there were some English ships at Terceira, though it is doubtful ; if there were, they rightly declined to imitate Strozzi's ill-judged and suicidal manœuvre of closing with the Spaniards, and—small blame to them—effected their escape. True or not, however, it appears certain that this reported flight of the English ships did have very considerable weight with many of the King's advisers ; and so advised, and at the same time impelled by wrath, Philip determined on the attempt. The Marquis of Santa Cruz was called on for his scheme, which extended to gigantic proportions. Everything was to be done from Spain. The whole shipping of the empire was to be collected. Every available soldier was to be mustered. According to the very detailed project submitted by Santa Cruz on the 12th of March, 1586, the numbers amounted to :—

—	Nos.	Tons	Sailors	Soldiers

giving a total of 556 ships of all kinds, and 85,332 men,¹ to which were to be added cavalry, artillerymen, volunteers, and non-combatants, bringing up the number of men to a gross total of 94,222.

Philip could not approve of a project so vast and so costly ; he resolved on the expedition, but conceived the idea of doing it at a cheaper rate by utilising the army in the Low Countries. From this grew up the scheme which ultimately took form. The Duke of Parma, in Flanders, was to prepare an army of invasion, and a number of flat-bottomed boats to carry it across the sea. The Marquis of Santa Cruz was to bring up the Channel a fleet powerful enough to crush any possible opposition, and carrying a body of troops which, when joined with those under Parma, would form an army at least as numerous as that which Santa Cruz had detailed as sufficient.

The necessary preparations were extensive, and it is not quite clear that, as they became more definite, Philip's ardour did not somewhat slacken. The cost was certain ; the issue was doubtful ; and even if successful, the result might perhaps not be exactly what was desired. Philip had always posed as a supporter of the Queen of Scots ; but the doubt must have suggested itself whether it was worth while, at this great cost, to conquer a kingdom for her—a kingdom which, with her French blood and French proclivities, would become virtually a French province. The death of the Queen of Scots, on the 8th of February, 1587, removed this difficulty. Even if the conquered kingdom was to be handed over to James, James was not bound to France as his mother had been. Placed on the throne of England by Spanish arms, he might be expected or even constrained to hold it virtually as a Spanish fief. But it might not be necessary to give it to James at all. Elizabeth was, of course, outside the reckoning; once dispossessed, she was merely the illegitimate offspring of an abominable and incestuous concubinage. But Philip himself was lineally descended from John of Gaunt, and had a theoretical right to the throne of England distinctly superior to that which, in the case of Henry VII., had been held sufficient. As an abstract problem in genealogy, Philip's claim was by no means absurd. Whether it could become something more, and take a practical form, might very well depend on the fortune of war.

Preparations were therefore now hurried on in earnest. Ships were collected at the several ports, and especially at Lisbon and Cadiz. It seemed probable that the invasion would be attempted in the summer of 1587, when some months before, Drake, with a fleet of twenty-four ships, all told, appeared on the coast. The orders under which he sailed from England, on the 2nd of April, were to prevent the different Spanish squadrons from joining, and where he found their ships, to destroy them. It was a grand and masterful step, but it had scarcely been ordered before the Queen repented of it. Counter orders were sent post-haste to Plymouth, but Drake had already sailed. They followed him, but never found him; and Drake, acting on those first given, went down to Cadiz and there sank, burnt, or brought away thirty-seven of the enemy's ships. They were as yet unarmed, unmanned, and, when the forts were once passed, could offer no resistance. Other damage Drake did, insulting Santa Cruz in the very port of Lisbon, offering battle, which Santa Cruz was in no position to accept. Ships he had in numbers, but they too were neither manned nor armed ; and before the guns were ready, Drake had stretched off to the Azores, where he captured the San Felipe, a very large and rich East Indiaman, whose treasures are said to have first opened the eyes of our English merchants to the capabilities of Eastern trade, and to have led to the foundation of the East India Company.

The destruction of shipping and stores at Cadiz necessarily delayed the equipment of the Spanish fleet ; the year passed away, and it was not ready. In the following January the Marquis of Santa Cruz died. The loss to Spain was incalculable, for he was the only man who by birth was entitled, and by experience was competent, to command such an expedition as that which he had set on foot. His name was encircled with a halo of naval victory. He had held a high command at the battle of Lepanto, and in the action at Terceira was accredited with having put to ignominious flight these very English who were now the object of attack. The King and his court, however, do not seem to have realised their loss, and with a light heart appointed Don Alonso Perez de Guzman el Bueno, Duke of Medina-Sidonia, to the vacant command. Medina-Sidonia, now in his thirty-eighth year, was a man with no qualification for the post except his distinguished birth and a gentleness of temper which, it was perhaps thought, would fit better with the idea of making him subordinate to the Duke of Parma. It had, indeed, appeared that Santa Cruz was not in the least disposed to accept this inferior part; and it may very well be that the King was almost relieved by the solution of the difficulty which his death had offered. His successor was utterly ignorant of naval affairs, had but little experience of military, and none whatever of high command. Personally brave, as became his long line of ancestry, his total want of experience and knowledge rendered him, as a commander, timid, undecided, and vacillating. His answer to the King, on being ordered to take on himself the command, is in itself a curiosity. The business, he wrote, was so great, so important, that he could not conscientiously undertake it, being, as he was, without experience or knowledge of either the sea or of war.¹ His objections were, however, overruled; and in an evil hour for his reputation, he consented. The equipment of the fleet was pushed on, and by the middle of May it was ready to sail from the Tagus. It did actually sail on the 20th of May.

It may here be said that the name 'Invincible,' so commonly given to this fleet, was not official. In Philip's numerous letters there is no trace of it. By him, by his secretary, by Medina-Sidonia and other officers, and by all the contemporary chroniclers, the fleet is spoken of as the Grand Fleet—a name constantly used in England during the eighteenth century for what we now call the Channel Fleet. In a semi-official list printed at Lisbon it was called La felictima Armada—the fortunate fleet. The 'Invincible' probably sprang out of the idle talk of some of the young adventurers (cf. p. 175), braggarts as became their age, or out of the silly gossip of the Lisbon taverns.¹

None the less, the power of Spain was everywhere recognised as gigantic. The Spanish soldiers were numerous, well-disciplined, inured to war; Spanish galleons, navigating the most distant seas, brought to the Spanish treasury the riches of India or Peru; and Spanish galleys had curbed the ambition of the fierce conquerors of Constantinople. Spanish statesmen were known to be most crafty and sagacious; and nineteenth century historians had not yet discovered that the Spanish king, who ruled one half of continental Europe and controlled the other, was ignorant and incapable, childish if not imbecile. In the sixteenth century he was believed to be a far-seeing, prudent, ambitious man, slow in council, swift in execution. His accumulated wrath against England tempted him to listen to the voice of his counsellors, who urged on the war, and of his ambition, which invited him to seize the inheritance of his forefathers; but, whilst yielding to the temptation, he endeavoured, so far as in him lay, to deserve that success which he hoped to win. He had no practical familiarity with war, but he had heard enough of English soldiers and English sailors to be convinced that they were not the dastards they were represented to be: he knew that if they had fled from Terceira, they certainly had not fled from Rymenam; the brilliant skirmish of

Zutphen had then a reputation not unlike that of the light cavalry charge at Balaclava forty years ago; and he was not ignorant of Drake's exploits in the West Indies, in the Pacific, or at Cadiz only the year before. He knew that the enterprise on which he was bent would not resemble a military promenade, and all the available forces of his vast empire were collected in this Grand Fleet. He hoped, too, for assistance from outside, and that, at any rate, a subsidy from the Pope would lessen the financial burden.

France, it was evident, might do much to forward his project, or to render it abortive; but already Philip exercised great influence over the party of the Guises, which his attitude as the champion of the Church and the avenger of their cousin, the Queen of Scots, confirmed. No politician has better understood the value of the maxim Divide et impera! and by the financial aid and moral support which he gave to the Guises, he rendered it certain that France would not take any active part against him, and not improbable that she might become a powerful auxiliary. To the last this remained a matter of doubt. It will be seen that Burghley and Walsyngham thought it not impossible, that Howard was fully convinced that a French fleet and a French army would join with the Spanish (pp. 203, 227). They knew that the French king was naturally antagonistic to the designs of Spain, but they had no trust in his steadfastness (p. 49); they could not gauge either the strength of his party or the pressure that might be brought to bear on him, and the 'day of the barricades' seemed to prostrate him before the Guises and Philip.

In England, as elsewhere, there prevailed an exalted opinion of Spanish power and of Spanish prowess. The prestige of Spanish arms stood high, and may be fairly compared with that of the Grand Monarque before Blenheim, or of Napoleon after Austerlitz or Jena. In forming a lower estimate of them the English sailors were almost alone, but their experience was exceptional. For the last twenty years they had been, in their own irregular way, fighting the Spaniards on every sea where they were to be met, and had come to the conclusion that, whatever the Spaniard might be ashore, afloat he was but a poor creature: the experiences of Drake, Hawkins, the Fenners, and scores of others had proved that, even with great odds in their favour, Spaniards were not invincible. Of all the panic-stricken accounts of the great armada which have come down to us, not one was written by a seaman or by any one who had practical knowledge of the Spaniards by sea. We are all familiar with the exaggerations of contemporary historians. The Spanish ships were so huge that ocean groaned beneath their weight; so lofty that they resembled rather castles or fortresses; so numerous that the sea was invisible—the spectator thought he beheld a populous town. What English sailors thought of them may be judged from a letter written by Fenner, who was with Drake when he burnt the shipping at Cadiz. ‘Twelve of her Majesty’s ships,’ he said, ‘were a match for all the galleys in the King of Spain’s dominions.’

Still, not even Drake or Fenner could feel perfect confidence whilst ignorant of the magnitude of the task before them. They had no fear of the fleet (pp. 229, 241); of the army they were not so sure. And then, too, the known power of Spain, the tavern gossip and braggadocio of Lisbon, and the reports of spies who felt in honour bound to give full value for their hire, grossly exaggerated the size, the might, the armament, and the equipment of the fleet as it sailed from Lisbon. Some of these reports (pp. 90, 122) may have been honestly meant. They appear to be based on the first proposal of Santa Cruz, the details of which may have been allowed to leak out. But the actual numbers were very different, and as to the equipment, it was so far from being perfect that by the time the fleet reached Cape St. Vincent vast quantities of provisions were found to be putrid, fit for nothing but to be thrown overboard. The ships were short of water, probably because the casks were leaky. The ships themselves were leaking—strained, it was said, by the heavy weather but really from being overmasted. Several of them were with difficulty kept afloat, some were dismasted, and the distress was so general that Medina-Sidonia determined to put into Corunna to refit. This he did, but without taking any precautions to let his intention be known through the fleet.¹ The Scilly Isles had been given out as the rendezvous in case of separation, and some dozen or more of the ships, finding they had lost sight of the admiral, did accordingly go to the neighbourhood of the Scilly Isles, where they were duly seen and reported at Plymouth (p. 221). Their recall, the collecting the fleet at Corunna, the refitting, the reprovisioning, all took time. The damage was so great, the number of sick so large, the season getting so advanced, that a council of war urgently recommended postponing the expedition till the next year. The King's orders were, however, imperative, and the fleet finally sailed from Corunna on the 12th of July.

The main part of the English fleet was meantime mustered at Plymouth, under the command of Lord Howard of Effingham, the Lord Admiral of England, with whom were Drake and Hawkyns as vice- and rear-admirals ; several noblemen, including Lord Thomas Howard, the admiral's cousin—his first cousin's grandson ; Lord Sheffield, his sister's son ; Sir Robert Southwell, his daughter's husband ; and most of the seamen whose names make up the maritime history of the century : Frobiser, Thomas Fenner and his cousins, Fenton and Luke Ward, Raymond, Lancaster, Richard Hawkyns, and many more. Large numbers of merchants' ships, levied by the Queen, or by their own towns, had joined the fleet, which as it lay at Plymouth consisted of about 80 sail all told. From the time of his return from the coast of Spain in the previous summer, Drake had been urgent that he should be sent out again, with a still more powerful squadron, to repeat the blow (pp. 124, 148, 166, 238). Hawkyns (p. 60), Frobiser, Fenner (p. 238)—all the seamen of experience—were of the same opinion. Howard, guided by their advice, repeatedly pressed the importance of the step (pp. 192, 200, 203), but Elizabeth steadfastly refused. It may be that she hoped for peace ; but it is difficult to believe that she was entirely hoodwinked by the false protestations of the Duke of Parma and by the negotiations carried on in Flanders. She was herself too well versed in the arts of dissimulation to be snared by such evident pretences. It is, perhaps, more probable that she believed the war might still be carried on in the same cheap and desultory fashion as during the last three years, and was unwilling to set Philip the example of more sustained efforts. It is very possible she had persuaded herself that the preparations in Spain were merely a threat, which, however, any aggressive action of hers might convert into a reality. And thus, notwithstanding the prayers and entreaties of Howard and Drake, backed up by every man of experience, no further attempt was made on the Spanish ports. It can scarcely be doubted that, if Drake had been permitted, he would have kindled such a blaze in the Tagus or in the harbour of Corunna as would have effectually prevented even the threat of an invasion.

It has been repeatedly stated¹ that the Duke of Medina-Sidonia was ordered by Philip to hug the French coast, so as to avoid the English fleet and to reach the Straits of Dover with his force intact. This is contrary to the fact. The Duke's instructions were to the very opposite effect. They ordered him, if he should meet Drake near the mouth of the Channel, to fall on him and destroy him; it would be more easy to destroy the English fleet piecemeal than after allowing it to collect in one. And, so far from directing him to hug the French coast, they advise the Scilly Isles or the Lizard as a rendezvous, and suggest the propriety of seizing on some unfortified port in the South of England.¹ As a matter of fact, a position south of the Scilly Isles was given out as a rendezvous in the first instance; in the second, on sailing from Corunna, the rendezvous was Mount's Bay.²

In crossing the Bay of Biscay the armada experienced some bad weather, and was a good deal scattered; barely two-thirds of the ships were in company when Medina-Sidonia sighted the Lizard on the afternoon of the 19th of July. There, whilst waiting for the fleet to collect, he hoisted the royal standard at the fore, and at the main a sacred flag, showing a crucifix between the figures of Our Lady and St. Mary Magdalene. Other flags there were by the score. The fleet was organised by provinces, and the ships of each squadron presumably wore the flag of its province—Andalusia, Guipuscoa, Naples, &c.—as well as the flags of the nobles and knights on board, and probably also the flag of the particular saint to which they were dedicated. But the flag which they appear to have worn in common as the flag of the empire was, strictly speaking, the Burgundian flag, which had been adopted by Spain in the time of the Emperor Charles V.—white, a saltire raguled red; and it may be noted that, amongst the great number and diversity of flags, the one flag which was not worn, and could not be worn, was the red and yellow ensign of the present day, a flag which was not invented till the year 1785.

The English flag at this time was the plain St. George's flag—white, a cross red—and this was worn by every English ship. The Ark, Lord Howard's ship, flew also the royal standard, the flag of the Queen's arms, and, probably at the fore, a flag of Howard's arms. Some of the other ships were also supplied with 'flags of the Queen's arms' and 'ensigns of silk' distinct from 'the flags of Saint George.' Many had streamers 'small and great,' and one, the Elizabeth Bonaventure, had 'a bloody flag,' the plain red flag which down to the end of the eighteenth century continued to be the signal to 'engage the enemy' (vol. ii.—September 25, Reports of Survey). That some of the ships, and especially those sent forth by the coast towns or by private individuals, wore also local or private flags, is not improbable, but the State Papers make no mention of such.

On Saturday, the 20th of July, the Spanish fleet was collected off the Lizard and moved slowly eastwards. Medina-Sidonia wrote to the King that he intended to proceed as far as the Isle of Wight, where he hoped to have word of the Duke of Parma. At present he had no intelligence, and was quite in the dark as to the enemy's movements. In passing Plymouth he hoped he might pick up some pinnace from which he could get information. In the afternoon, however, many ships were seen, though thick weather and mist prevented his counting them; and towards midnight an English boat was brought in, with four men on board, from whom he learnt that the English fleet, commanded by the Admiral of England and by Drake, had put to sea that afternoon.¹

Medina-Sidonia's statement is perfectly clear, connected and intelligible, and, being written on the very day, has high claims on our belief. It describes, too, conduct which is quite in keeping with the character of the man. He avowedly knew nothing of the art of war, and had now come on the enemy's coast, and was about to proceed leisurely through the enemy's sea, without taking any trouble to find out where the enemy's fleet was. His frank acknowledgment, whilst it proves him a fool, argues that he was, at least, a truthful one. On the other hand, the letter of Don Pedro de Valdes to the King (vol. ii.—August 21) speaks of a fisherman being captured on the Saturday, of a council of war being held to consider his intelligence that the English fleet was at anchor at Plymouth, and of the resolution come to, to 'make to the mouth of the haven and set upon the enemy, if it might be done with any advantage,' a design which was prevented by their discovering the English fleet at sea, some two hours later. Captain Duro accepts a still different story, according to which the council of war was held on the Friday afternoon, and they then knew that the English fleet was at Plymouth. At this meeting Recalde, Leyva and Oquendo, more particularly, urged that the destruction of the enemy's fleet was the first object, and that the opportunity ought not to be neglected; to which Medina-Sidonia replied that the King's orders did not permit him any latitude, and compelled him to proceed without delay to join the Duke of Parma.¹ But the reference which Captain Duro gives for this story not only does not sanction it, but confirms the statement of Medina-Sidonia ; and as Don Pedro's letter was written a month after the date, it is quite possible that his memory deceived him as to the sequence of events.

About the result, however, there is no difference of opinion. During the Friday evening the English warped out of the harbour ; on the Saturday they beat out of the Sound, 'very hardly, the wind being at South-West. About three of the clock in the afternoon they descried the Spanish fleet, and did what they could to work for the wind' (p. 288). The wind, by veering to the West-North-West,² and the Spaniards, by sailing large through the night, assisted their efforts. On Sunday morning, when the two fleets were first in presence of each other, the English were to windward, and by their practical skill and the weatherly qualities of their ships, had no difficulty in keeping the advantage they had gained.

And now, before the fighting begins, it will be well to examine the comparative force of the opposing fleets. We have all known from our infancy that the Spanish ships, as compared with the English, were stupendous in point of size, marvellous in their strength ; in guns and in number of men beyond all proportion. As to the numbers, the first proposal of Santa Cruz has already been given. It was never anything more than a proposal. The actual numbers when the fleet sailed from the Tagus on the 20th of May were :—¹

Ships	Tons	Guns	Men
130	57,868	2,431	8,050 seamen 18,973 soldiers 1,382 volunteers, &c. 2,088 rowers
Total . . .			30,493

These numbers, however, had suffered a marked decrease before the fleet left Corunna, and a still further decrease before the fleet came into the Channel. Of the ships left behind there is no exact account. Some, and some large ships amongst them, certainly did not come on. Some, again, appear to have parted company on the voyage; and of four galleys, from which much had been expected, one was driven ashore and wrecked near Bayonne; the other three, making very bad weather of it, put into different French ports, and eventually returned to Spain.² Allowing for these losses, it is doubtful whether more than 120 ships of all sizes came into the Channel; the number of men did certainly not exceed 24,000; and in the council of war held at Corunna it was estimated as low as 22,500.³ Of the ships, about half were transports or victuallers pure and simple, and took no part in the fighting; many, too, were pinnaces, or despatch boats, unfitted for fighting; but they all carried men, sailors or soldiers, who must be deducted from the gross numbers. The effective total of fighting men in the Spanish fleet can thus scarcely have been more than from 10,000 to 12,000.

On the other hand, the total number of English ships, of all sizes and qualities, registered as in the Queen's service during any part of the season was 197, bearing 15,925 men; to which must be added the many recruits sent off from Plymouth on the 21st of July (p. 289), or who joined as volunteers in the passage up Channel. It is difficult to estimate the gross total at less than from 17,000 to 18,000 men. Of the 197 ships, however, by far the greater number neither had, nor were meant to have, any part in the fighting; many of them were not even present when the fighting was going on. Seymour, for instance, with all his squadron, did not join the Admiral till the 27th of July. The fifteen victuallers which went west, under Burnell, in June, were probably discharged at once, and their men pressed for the great ships. Four of the coast ships with Seymour were sent away to convoy the Stade fleet; six others were discharged during June, for want of victuals (p. 255). The eight London ships under Gorges (p. 311) and the ten under Bellingham (p. 339) did not leave the river till after the 29th of July, and joined Seymour only after his return from the north (vol. ii.—Seymour to Walsyngham, Aug. 1). The galley Bonavolia was, at the last moment, judged unseaworthy, and was sent into the river; on the 29th of July she was lying at the Nore-head (p. 338). These which are certainly known to have been absent from the battle of Gravelines account for 2,650 men, a number not affected by the burning of eight ships at Calais. Of the rest, whether present or not cannot be determined, 37 had crews of not more than 30 men, and 900 in all. No one will suppose that these pinnaces added to the effective strength of the fleet on the day of battle, any more than the Pickle or Entreprenante did at Trafalgar. They had their use in the fleet, but that use was not engaging the enemy's great ships. And many others of the English vessels were scarcely of greater value as men-of-war, so that the number of men who, even in appearance, took part in the battle of Gravelines can scarcely have been more than from eight to nine thousand.

Our idea of the size of the Spanish ships has been also somewhat exaggerated. According to Barrow,¹ 'The best of the Queen's ships placed alongside one of the first class of Spaniards would have been like a sloop-of-war by the side of a first rate.' In point of tonnage they were, in fact, the same. The largest Spaniard, the Regazona, of the Levant squadron, is given as 1,249 tons. The largest English ship, the Triumph, is described as of 1,000 or 1,100 tons, and many circumstances seem to show that, whilst the reckoning of tonnage was everywhere extremely vague, the English method gave a smaller result than the Spanish. The San Salvador, for instance, was classed by the Spaniards as of 958 tons; when she fell into English hands, she was described as, by estimation, of 600 (vol. i. Aug. 24). There is no doubt, however, that the Spanish ships looked larger. Their poops and fore-castles, rising tier above tier to a great height, towered far above the lower-built English. Not that the large English ships were by any means flush-decked ; but they were not so high-charged as the Spanish. The difference offered a great advantage to the Spaniards in hand-to-hand fighting ; it told terribly against them when their enemy refused to close ; it made their ships leewardly and unmanageable in even a moderate breeze, and, added to the Spanish neglect of recent improvements in rig—notably, the introduction of the bowline—rendered them very inferior to the English in the open sea.¹

And not only was there this inferiority of the ships ; there was at least a corresponding inferiority of the seamen. The Spaniards, and still more the Italians, were to a great extent fair-weather sailors. Some there doubtless were who had been through the Straits of Magellan or had doubled the Cape of Good Hope, but by far the greater number had little experience beyond the Mediterranean, or the equable run down the trades to the West Indies. To the English, on the other hand, accustomed from boyhood to the Irish or Iceland fisheries ; in manhood to the voyages to the north-west with Frobiser or Davys, or round the world with Drake, and semi-piratical cruises in the Bay of Biscay or in the track of the homeward-bound treasure-ships, the summer gales of the Channel were, by comparison, passing trifles—things to be ward off, but not to be feared. Even if the men had been equal in quality, the Spanish ships were terribly undermanned. The seamen habitually gave place to the soldiers ; the soldiers commanded ; the seamen did the drudgery, and not one was borne in excess of what their soldier masters thought necessary. The absolute numbers speak for themselves, and one comparison will be sufficient. The San Martin, of 1,000 tons, the flagship of the Duke of Medina-Sidonia, had 177 seamen and 300 soldiers. The Ark, of 800 tons, the flagship of Lord Howard, had 300 seamen and 125 soldiers.

More important, however, than even this inferiority of the Spanish ships and sailors was the inferiority of their guns and gunners. It was long believed in this country, and has been repeatedly stated, that the Spanish guns were both numerous and large. They were, in fact, neither one nor the other ; as a rule they were small—4, 6 or 9-pounders ; they were comparatively few, and they were very badly worked.

The guns at that time in use on board ship were, roughly speaking, the same in the English and Spanish navies ; and as everything was rough, as the minimum windage prescribed was one-fourth of the bore of the gun and as much more as pleased the gunner, the Englishmen felt no difficulty in assigning English names to the Spanish guns, as shown in the following tables. The weight of the shot is approximate, but sufficiently accurate for purposes of comparison (vol. ii. App. C).

I. Cannon . . .	Perhaps a 60-pounder, but more probably 42.
II. Demi-Cannon . .	A 30-pounder.
III. Cannon-Pedro . .	A very light 24-pounder.
IV. Culverin . . .	A long 18-pounder.
V. Basiliaco . . .	A 15-pounder.

VII. Saker . . .	A 6-pounder.
VIII. Minion . . .	A 4-pounder.

With the exception of the Tiger, whose armament is taken from an order¹ by Sir William Wynter in 1586, the English armaments are given from a table dated 1595-9, printed by Derrick.² The comparison shows that the change between 1586 and 1595 had been rather to decrease the weight of the guns. Wynter's order of 1586 also gives the armament of two ships which he distinguishes as galleon P. Pett at Deptford, and galleon Ma. Baker at Woolwich. In 1588 they were known as the Rainbow and Vanguard. Two papers³ of 1595 give estimates for the armaments of three ships 'now in building,' the ordnance for the first two being described as 'answerable to the pieces that are in the and comparing the armament ordered in 1586 for the Rainbow and Vanguard, two ships which may be classed with the Nonpareil given in the former table, the necessary inference is that the armaments of 1595 were not so heavy as those carried in 1588.

Another estimate, which, though inexact, is entitled to credit, is that given of the armament of the Revenge, also a ship of 500 tons, taken by the Spaniards in 1591, and reported by them to have 43 brass guns: 20 on the lower deck of from 4,000 to 6,000 pounds weight, and the rest from 2,000 to 3,000.¹ The greater weights correspond to the cannons, demi-cannons, or culverins; the smaller to the demi-culverins and sakers.

Of the Spanish armament we cannot speak with the same absolute knowledge; but it seems admitted that the galleasses were the most heavily armed ships in the fleet, and of these the San Lorenzo, which was taken at Calais, was the largest and heaviest. The report of her armament given by our people (p. 349), who had possession of her for some time, corresponds fairly well with the official statement.¹ The Nuestra Señora del Rosario was the large ship captured by Drake and sent into Torbay. Her armament is given from the official inventory taken at Torquay (vol. ii. August 29, November 5). She is spoken of by Duro as one of the most powerful and best ships of the fleet.² The San Salvador was the ship partly blown up and sent to Weymouth (pp. 9, 301); her armament is also given from the official inventory (vol. ii. Aug. 24). Some of her small guns were very likely thrown overboard by the explosion. Duro tabulates her as carrying 25 in all. The inventory accounts for 19, including four old minions and one old fowler. The missing six were probably fowlers or falcons. The two remaining ships have their armament given by Duro.³ They do not seem in any way distinguished from others of the same size; they belonged to the Levant squadron, and are classed with the San Juan de Sicilia, of 800 tons and 26 guns, which took a prominent part in the battle of the 29th of July. There is no published account of the armament of the great ships of the Portuguese squadron, and amongst them the San Martin, San Felipe, and San Mateo, of which all were in the thickest of the fight, and the two last were driven on shore in a sinking state. It was probably not very different from that of the N. S. del Rosario. There is here, of course, no suggestion that the more powerful ships were armed like the Anunciada or Santa Maria de Vison; but it appears a fair presumption that many of the ships which have been counted as effective were so armed.

It should also be noted that whereas the Spanish ships of below 300 tons burden carried only four or six small guns, English ships of 200 tons had a very respectable armament, and ships still smaller were not altogether despicable. Of the way in which the English merchant ships were armed we have little knowledge. The larger ones, under the command of men like Lancaster or George Fenner, may certainly be classed as efficient men-of-war. The Margaret and John, of 200 tons, is named as having rendered good service on more than one occasion; and considering that many of the others had probably been on privateering cruises, and that the Pelican or Golden Hind, in which Drake went round the world—a ship of nominally 100 tons—had 14 guns, it is allowable to question Barrow's judgment that, 'looking at their tonnage, two-thirds of them, at least, could have been of little, if any, service, and must have required uncommon vigilance to keep them out of harm's way.'¹ They were not, indeed, the ships that were to be looked for in the forefront of the fight—no more was the Euryalus or the Naiad at Trafalgar—but there is no reason to doubt that they did, in their own way, render good and efficient service.

It was not only in the number and weight of guns that the English had a great comparative advantage; they were immensely superior in the working of them. According to Captain Duro, whose statement is fully corroborated by original writers and by known facts, 'the cannon was held by the Spaniards to be an ignoble arm ; well enough for the beginning of the fray, and to pass away the time till the moment of engaging hand to hand, that is, of boarding. Actuated by such notions, the gunners were recommended to aim high, so as to dismantle the enemy and prevent his escape ; but, as a vertical stick is a difficult thing to hit, the result was that shot were expended harmlessly in the sea, or, at best, made some holes in the sails, or cut a few ropes of no great consequence.'¹ On the other hand, the gun was the weapon which the English sailors had early learned to trust to. Their practice might appear contemptible enough to an Excellent's gun's crew, but everything must have a beginning. With no disparts or side scales, with no aid beyond a quadrant or marked quoin to lay the gun horizontal, and with shot which—a good inch and a half less in diameter than the bore of the gun—wobbled from side to side, or from top to bottom, leaving the gun at any angle that chance dictated, the hitting the object aimed at was excessively doubtful.

Thoroughly trained gunners might perhaps have done better. In the opinion of William Thomas, master gunner of Flushing, 'Had her Majesty's ships been manned with a full supply of good gunners, it would have been the woefullest time or enterprise that ever the Spaniard took in hand, and no otherwise to be thought or doubted of but that the most noblest victory by the sea that ever was heard of would have fallen to her Majesty.

What can be said but our sins was the cause that so much powder and shot spent, and so long time in fight, and in comparison thereof so little harm?' (vol. ii.—Thomas to Lord Burghley, September 20). But it does not appear that Mr. Thomas had any experience on board ship; and, as a matter of fact, there were gunners on board each of the Queen's ships—about 8 per cent. of the ship's company—sufficient for the captains of the guns. The guns' crews were, of course, seamen, and, with no special training, but firing a great many shot, they did manage to get home with sufficient to do a good deal of damage. The Spanish accounts, speaking of the quickness of the English fire, estimate the English expenditure of shot as about three times their own.

But the Spaniards were fully warned of the peculiar strength of the English. On this point, the King's instructions to Medina-Sidonia before he left Lisbon are quite clear. 'You are especially to take notice that the enemy's object will be to engage at a distance, on account of the advantage which they have from their artillery and the offensive fire-works with which they will be provided; and on the other hand, the object on our side should be to close and grapple and engage hand to hand.'¹ And the determination to do so, without understanding that the choice of closing or not closing might not lie altogether with them, may partly explain the comparatively small quantity of shot per gun provided for such a vast undertaking; a quantity so small that, notwithstanding the slowness of their fire, they ran short even after the skirmishes in the Channel.

In estimating the opposing forces, this great superiority of the English armament must be taken into account. Of Spanish ships of 300 tons and upwards, the number that left Lisbon was officially stated as eighty : but of these, eighteen were rated as ships of burden (urcas de carga) ; and though they carried troops and some guns, could not be counted as effective ships of war. Of the remaining sixty-two, many ought to be reckoned in the same category. An armament such as that of the Anunciada or Sta Maria speaks for itself. From the number of soldiers they carried, and from their lofty poops and forecastles, such ships would be dangerous enough in a hand-to-hand fight, but would be perfectly harmless as long as they were kept at a distance. But counting all these, we have the following comparison of the fleets :—

	Spanish		English
	Nos.	Tons Average	Nos.	Tons Average
Of 300 tons and upwards	62	727	23	552
Of 200 to 300 tons . . .	--	—	26	210

The English ships of 200 tons being included, as unquestionably superior as fighting machines to many of the much larger Spanish ships.

We may assume that these forty-nine ships were all more or less engaged during the nine days, and especially in the battle of Gravelines. The fact that Captain Coxe, of the Delight, a pinnace of 50 tons, was slain by a round shot, is a proof that all the small ships did not keep out of harm's way ; but we may fully accept the statement in Wynter's letter to Walsyngham (vol. ii.—August 1), that on the 29th of July the greater number of the merchant ships were of little use, 'otherwise than that they did make a show.' It must have been so. Ships of 150 tons and less carried no guns bigger than the saker (cf. p. 339), a 6-pounder, and their armament consisted for the most part of minions, fowlers, &c., throwing shot of four or three or two pounds, very effective against bodies of men or boats or small vessels, quite useless against the thick sides of the Spanish galleons. But when the Spaniards were driven from their anchorage at Calais, the English were left with the weather-gage. The wind was blowing fresh, and the armada streamed off before it. When their weathermost ships were attacked, those to leeward could render no assistance. It was a condition of naval warfare which had been and has been repeated over and over again, from the battle of Sandwich in 1217 to that of the Nile in 1798, and always with the same inevitable result. The weathermost of the Spanish ships were, indeed, the largest and the best, but not more than thirty-two seem to have been actually engaged (Wynter, August 1), and the brunt of the battle fell on some fifteen.¹

It is unnecessary here to describe the fights of that eventful week. The official papers which follow tell how on Sunday morning, the 21st of

July, the English, having gained the wind, fell on the ships of the Spanish rear-guard, under the command of Don Juan Martinez de Recalde, in the Santa Ana, and without permitting them to close, as they vainly tried to do, pounded them with their great guns for the space of three hours, with such effect that Recalde sent to Don Pedro de Valdes for assistance, his ship having been hulled several times and her foremast badly wounded; how Don Pedro's ship, the Nuestra Señora del Rosario, in going to his assistance, fouled first one and then another of her consorts, lost her bowsprit, foremast, and maintopmast, and was left by Medina-Sidonia, who, whether from spite and malice, as Don Pedro believed, or from gross ignorance and incompetence, resolved to push on to Dunkirk, even at the sacrifice of this large and powerful ship, which was taken possession of by Drake the next morning, and sent into Torbay; how another ship, the San Salvador, of 958 tons, was partially blown up and was similarly left, to be taken possession of by order of the Admiral, and to be sent into Weymouth; how on the Tuesday there was another sharp action off Portland, and again a third on the Thursday off the Isle of Wight, when Recalde's ship, the Santa Ana, of 768 tons, received so much further damage that she left the fleet and ran herself ashore near Havre; how the English, joined as they passed along by many small vessels full of men, but finding their store of shot running short, were content for the next day with closely following up the Spaniards, who on Saturday afternoon anchored off Calais, whilst the English anchored about a mile to westward and to windward of them. Here Howard was joined by the squadron of the Narrow Seas, under Lord Henry Seymour and Sir William Wynter, bringing the number of effective ships of war up to about forty-nine. The Spanish numbers had been reduced by the loss of three of their largest and best ships, and were further reduced off Calais by the loss of the San Lorenzo, the largest and most heavily armed of the galleasses. For on Sunday night Howard sent eight fireships in amongst the Spanish fleet ; the Spaniards, panic-struck, cut their cables, and by wind and tide were swept far to leeward. In the confusion the San Lorenzo damaged her rudder, and in the morning was driven ashore and, after a sharp fight, captured by the boats of the Ark and some of the smaller ships. But the fleet was away off Gravelines ; and there, on that Monday, the 29th of July, was fought the great battle which, more distinctly perhaps than any battle of modern times, has moulded the history of Europe—the battle which curbed the gigantic power of Spain, which shattered the Spanish prestige, and established the basis of England's empire.

And the official relations give many of the details of this great fight. They tell how the Spaniards, having formed themselves into a half-moon, convexity to the north,¹ were charged on the wings and centre by our fleet ; on the westernmost wing by Drake, with Hawkyns, Frobiser, Fenton, Fenner, and others ; in the centre by Howard, with his kinsmen and the Earl of Cumberland ; and on the eastern wing by Seymour, with Wynter and the squadron of the Narrow Seas ; how the wings were driven in on their centre ; how the ships, thus driven together, fouled each other, and lay a helpless and inert mass, while the English, with heavier guns and superior numbers, pounded them in comparative safety. 'The fight,' Wynter wrote, 'continued from nine of the clock until six of the clock at night, in which time the Spanish army bore away North-North-East or North by East as much as they could, keeping company one with another. . . . I deliver it to your Honour upon the credit of a poor gentleman, that out of my ship there was shot 500 shot of demi-cannon, culverin and demi-culverin ; and when I was furthest off in discharging any of the pieces, I was not out of the shot of their harquebus, and most times within speech one of another ; and surely every man did well. No doubt the slaughter and hurt they received was great, as time will discover it ; and when every man was weary with labour, and our cartridges spent, and munitions wasted—I think in some altogether—we ceased, and followed the enemy' (vol. ii.—Wynter, August 1).

All this is told at length in the following pages. It is enough to say here, that the Spaniards were terribly beaten ; that two of their largest ships, ships of the crack Portugal squadron, the San Felipe and San Mateo, ran themselves ashore on the Netherlands' coast to escape foundering in the open sea (vol. ii.—Borlas to Walsyngham, August 3). Howard says that three were sunk, and four or five driven ashore. In one case he can scarcely have been mistaken. 'On the 30th,' he says, 'one of the enemy's great ships was espied to be in great distress by the captain [Robert Crosse] of her Majesty's ship called the Hope, who, being in speech of yielding unto the said captain, before they could agree on certain conditions, sank presently before their eyes' (vol. ii.—Abstract of Accidents, August 7).

The actual loss of life was certainly very great—how great was never known, for the pursuit of the English and the disastrous passage round the west of Ireland prevented any satisfactory attempt at official returns. One set of depositions (vol. ii.—September 12) outlines the early losses and suggests the causes of those that followed. It is incorrect to attribute everything to the bad weather. Bad weather in August is comparative, and is seldom such as to be dangerous to well-found ships; nor, indeed, do the accounts from Ireland or Spain tell of any wholesale losses from storm. The ships were lost partly from bad pilotage, partly from bad seamanship, but principally because they were not well found; because they were leaking like sieves, had no anchors, their masts and rigging shattered, their water-casks smashed, no water, and were very short-handed; and that they were in this distressed condition was the work of the English fleet, more especially at Calais and Gravelines.

An exhaustive account of these losses among the Isles of Scotland and on the coast of Ireland has not been attempted: a few of the Irish papers will serve as indications, and amongst them, or the pages of La Armada Invencible, the fuller narrative must be sought. The English story ends when the Spanish fleet passed the Firth of Forth; and for the rest, it is sufficient to say that, according to the official Spanish reports, which, in such an overwhelming disaster, are rather mixed, about half of the original 130 got home again ; some apparently by the simple process of not going farther than Corunna, some by turning back before they crossed the Bay of Biscay.

A point of more immediate naval interest regards the statements that have been made of the wholesale death of the English seamen from starvation, or from the unwholesome nature of the victuals which the Queen's shameful parsimony compelled them to eat. Such statements have been put forward, in an authoritative manner, by our best and most popular historians, as established by sufficient evidence, which, as it appears, has been misunderstood, and, taken apart from its context, has been misinterpreted. The full evidence is now before us, and permits us to say positively that, from first to last, the Queen had nothing to do with the victualling of the fleet. No doubt she insisted on rigid economy in everything ; no doubt Burghley, and Walsyngham, and Howard knew that their accounts would be subjected to a strict, probably an unsympathetic, scrutiny, and that no item would pass which could be objected to ; but with this general knowledge, the management of the business was left entirely in their hands.

And almost every page of these volumes tells of the unceasing care with which it was conducted. Money is freely ordered ; bills are passed and paid ; letters are written to Darell directing him to provide for the victualling, and by Darell, explaining what is being done and how : again and again Burghley adds up the totals of men and money, or translates items and results into the Roman notation,¹ so as to have a clear idea of what was going on. To any one examining the evidence, there can be no question as to the victualling being conducted on a fairly liberal scale, as far as the money was concerned. It was in providing the victuals that the difficulty lay. What victualling yards or stores there were were still in their infancy, and of little use in a great emergency. The beef had to be salted, the biscuit to be baked, to meet the requirements of the day. When a fleet of unprecedented magnitude was collected, when a sudden and unwonted demand was made on the victualling officers, it would have been strange indeed if things had gone quite smoothly. Even in this present age, with an organised but inexperienced commissariat, the troops in the Crimea suffered grievous privations, and died by hundreds. In 1588 there was no commissariat at all, and the whole burden of the business fell on the shoulders of Darell, to whose energy, ability, zeal and goodwill Howard repeatedly bears witness (p. 197).

Howard, on his part, was very anxious that the ships should be victualled for six weeks at least, so that, by completing at frequent short intervals, they might always be ready for service. He wrote that King Henry VIII. 'never made a less supply than' six weeks' (p. 137)—a statement wildly incorrect. It may be hoped that the early organisation of the navy will be elucidated in some future volume; at present little is known beyond the fact that in 1513 Sir Edward Howard complained most bitterly that some of his ships were provisioned for only a fortnight;¹ and though it is very possible that ships going on a foreign expedition, carefully arranged beforehand—such perhaps as the expedition to the Forth in 1544—were provisioned for six weeks, and were also accompanied by victuallers, we may be quite certain that for home service—as, for instance, in 1545—they were provisioned from hand to mouth, on the same system as in 1588. No other was, indeed, possible where there were no stores, and where, from the nature of the service, the necessity could not have been foreseen and prepared for in advance.

No doubt such a system was as bad as it well could be, and especially bad in the case of a great fleet which might at any moment be called on to put to sea, to meet or to follow the enemy. As early as the 3rd of March, Fenner called Walsingham's attention to the danger. 'I fear,' he wrote, 'when we shall be hastened to go, our provision of victual needful will not be ready in a month, in which time it will be no small matter, the waste in doing nothing' (p. 92); and on the 8th of April, Howard, writing to Burghley, put it still more clearly. 'I thought good to put your Lordship in remembrance how necessary it is to have a better proportion of victual than for one month, considering the time and the service that is likely to fall out, and what danger it might breed if our want of victual should be at the time of service. We shall be now victualled unto the 18th of May, and by the advertisements that giveth the largest time for the coming out of the Spanish forces is the 15th of May. Then have we three days' victual. If it be fit to be so, it passeth my reason' (p. 137).

The particular danger which Howard thus pointed out did actually occur. On the 21st of July, when Howard received intelligence of the Spaniards being off the Lizard, the ships at Plymouth were employed in completing their victuals to the 10th of August; 'only,' wrote Darell on the 22nd (p. 294), 'the haste of my Lord Admiral was such in his setting forth upon Saturday morning, as that divers of his ships had not leisure to receive the full of their last proportions.' Even so, however, things were not so bad as they seemed, for, 'by placing of more than four men to a mess and also by the mortality which hath been amongst them, the ships (having been from time to time furnished by me with their due proportions, as if that had not been) have all in them a store, which no doubt will serve them a good time after their ordinary victualling be expired.'

We must suppose that Burghley and Walsingham were quite able to see that such a danger was no vague fancy, but to alter the system at a moment's warning was impossible. The provisions were not ready; there were no government establishments to fall back on; and from the 23rd of May, when the Lord Admiral went to Plymouth, Darell was scouring the country round, buying up what he could, more like a mess-steward with a market-basket than the agent-victualler of a great fleet. Every available means had to be used to eke out the supplies. A Hamburg ship laden with rice coming into the Sound, was summarily stayed and the rice bought for the use of the navy (p. 189). The 'scantyings' referred to by Howard (p. 219) was another means. The men were put at five or six in a mess instead of four. To many writers this has seemed an atrocious measure specially invented by the Queen in her rage for economy. It was—they say—stealing the men's victuals. As a matter of certain fact, the Queen had nothing to do with it. It was the established custom in the navy and continued to be so for the next 250 years. When the stowage of ships was very limited, when there were no stores in distant parts of the earth, any ship going on a long voyage or being thrown on her own resources for any length of time, placed her men at 'six upon four' as a matter of course;¹ so much so, that it is unusual to find it mentioned in naval Memoirs. Unquestionably it was an evil. Putting the men on insufficient food lowered their vitality and made them a ready prey to scurvy and the many other diseases then supposed to be incidental to sea life; but it was not considered by either officers or men more than a passing hardship, to be endured, not merely for the necessity, but for the convenience of the service; though latterly convenience alone was held not to warrant it, and at the present time it could scarcely be done except on extreme emergency. In putting the ships' companies on short allowance, Howard was adopting the most ordinary precaution, in view of a possible scarcity of provisions, and the indignation which has been expressed about it by writers ignorant of naval custom is altogether uncalled for; the more so, indeed, as the short allowance complained of was two-thirds of two pounds of beef and of a gallon of beer.

But this beer, it is said, was sour. That also was not unusual. It was nasty, it was unwholesome; but so long as beer continued to be the authorised drink on board ships of war, so long were the never-ending complaints of its being sour. Hawke's correspondence in 1759 is unusually full of such complaints, and especially of the West country beer. 'Our daily employment,' he wrote on the 4th of August, 'is condemning the beer from Plymouth'; to which the Admiralty replied that they were sorry to hear of the beer being bad, 'but the Commissioners of Victualling informed them that the uncommon hot weather this summer has occasioned the beer to spoil upon moving.' Howard's complaint, also in August, is of the beer from Sandwich. Both the man who supplied it and Darell declared that it was good when it was put on board; a survey showed that it had gone sour within a month, which Howard thought must be the brewer's fault (vol. ii.—August 26). The brewer excused it by the want of hops, a matter which Howard did not concern himself with, but wrote. 'I know not which way to deal with the mariners to make them rest contented with sour beer, for nothing doth displease them more.' Nevertheless, Howard's letter does not authorise the paraphrase of it given by Mr. Froude :—' Notwithstanding the disorder was traced definitely to the poisonous beer, it continued to be served out. Nothing better was allowed till it was consumed.'¹ What Howard says is ' The mariners have a conceit—and I think it true, and so do all the captains here—that sour drink hath been a great cause of this infection amongst us. . . . Mr. Darell makes trial to brew the sour beer again, and so to mix it with other new beer, which I hope will do well.' Between the 'mariners' conceit' of Howard and the 'definite tracing' of Mr. Froude, there appears nearly as much difference as between 'brewing the sour beer again' and 'continuing to serve it out . . . till it was consumed.'

But in such cases sailors and their officers have sometimes had very queer 'conceits,' as when, for instance, in Anson's celebrated voyage across the Pacific, the commodore and Michell and the surgeons, discussing the terrible scurvy that was raging, came to the conclusion that—'the steams arising from the ocean may have a tendency to render the air they are spread through less properly adapted to the support of the life of terrestrial animals, unless these steams are corrected by effluvia of another kind, and which perhaps the land alone can supply ;'² whereupon Anson administered to the sick 'the pill and drop of Mr. Ward,' two abominable quack medicines³ which seem to have been both emetic and cathartic in a high degree. The fancies of Howard and his men may be considered as in a similar category, for there can be no doubt that the sickness which so terribly scourged our ships' companies was of the nature of typhus, and had been busy in some of the ships—especially in the Elizabeth Jonas—before the Spaniards came into the Channel. It is very possible that the pestilence was aggravated by scarcity and bad provisions, but it was primarily and chiefly due to infection from the shore and from ignorance or neglect of what we now know as sanitary laws; and it seems an interesting point, that the ships commanded by the experienced old salts escaped comparatively lightly. The ships named as most heavily scourged are the Elizabeth Jonas, the White Bear, and the Lion, commanded by Howard's kinsmen, men splendid in the day of battle, but of no experience in the very necessary art of keeping a ship clean and sweet. A similar infection continued occasionally to scourge our ships' companies, and still more frequently and more severely French or Spanish ships' companies, till near the close of last century. In our service, at least, it is now happily almost forgotten.

The want of ammunition experienced by our ships even after two days' fighting is another point which has been brought forward as illustrating the niggardly behaviour of the Queen. As before, it was a detail with which the Queen had nothing to do, and—also as before—there was no available store in the kingdom. Anticipating the want, Walsyngham had directed his agent to buy powder in the Low Countries (p. 312), though little seems to have been forthcoming from that quarter. But the full explanation of the want seems to lie in the rapidity of the fire which has already been mentioned. The ships had the usual quantity on board, but the expenditure was more, very many times more, than anyone could have conceived. Drake, indeed (p. 125), and perhaps others of the more experienced sailors, men who had been at Cadiz when the King's beard was singed, or who had, for years past, been settling their personal quarrels with the Spaniard in their own irregular way, might have some idea that a great deal of powder would be burnt ; but they were probably alone in that belief.

It has not been remembered, it needs an effort to remember, that the off-fighting then practised by the English was an essentially new phase of naval war. The only thing that had at all resembled it, and that on a very small scale, was the distant interchange of shots between the English and French fleets at Spithead in 1545. But at Lepanto, the memory of which was still fresh in men's minds, the fighting was, for the most part, hand to hand, as it also was in the still more recent action at Terceira, from which the English were reported to have fled so ingloriously ; and beyond question, not only the Spaniards, but many of the English officers and most—perhaps all—of the Queen's ministers expected that it would be so again. It was thus that when Richard Drake was sent to the Lord Admiral by the Council, he was directed to inquire how it was that none of the Spanish ships had been boarded (p. 355). Sir Walter Raleigh, who must have talked with Howard and Drake and Hawkyins while the business was fresh in their memories, has left us what we may consider very direct testimony on this point. He says :—

‘Certainly, he that will happily perform a fight at sea must believe that there is more belonging to a good man of war upon the waters than great daring, and must know that there is a great deal of difference between fighting loose or at large and grappling. To clap ships together without consideration belongs rather to a madman than to a man of war ; for by such an ignorant bravery was Peter Strozzi lost at the Azores, when he fought against the Marquis of Santa Cruz. In like sort had the Lord Charles Howard, Admiral of England, been lost in the year 1588, if he had not been better advised than a great many malignant fools were, that found fault with his demeanour. The Spaniards had an army aboard them and he had none ; they had more ships than he had, and of higher building and charging ; so that, had he entangled himself with those great and powerful vessels, he had greatly endangered this kingdom of England. For twenty men upon the defences are equal to a hundred that board and enter ; whereas then, contrariwise, the Spaniards had a hundred for twenty of ours, to defend themselves withal. But our admiral knew his advantage and held it ; which had he not done, he had not been worthy to have held his head.’¹

But this off-fighting and this rapid and continuous fire quickly exhausted the supply of ammunition which had seemed sufficient ; and though some was sent from the Spanish prize in Torbay, some also from the shattered prize at Weymouth, some from Portsmouth by the Earl of Sussex, some from London by Walsyngham, and more, perhaps, that has not been recorded, the magazines of the principal ships were almost depleted on the evening of the 29th of July (vol. ii.—Wynter to Walsyngham, August 1), and the pursuit of the next three days was strictly, as Howard called it, 'setting on a brag countenance' (vol. ii.—August 7).

Another stock complaint against the Queen is that the men were not paid their wages. This again was a detail with which the Queen was not concerned. The money was sanctioned by the Council and ordered by the Lord Treasurer. It was presumably paid to the Treasurer of the Navy, and if he had kept it at usance for his own advantage, he would only have been doing what was and continued to be the custom, both in the navy and the army, to the end of the eighteenth century. The prompt payment of naval officers and seamen is, indeed, a thing of the present day. But in fact, the Elizabethan seamen were very much better off in that respect than their successors under the Commonwealth, or the Restoration, or even George III. When the ship was paid off, these got a ticket which they could cash at whatever discount the Jew-agent chose to abstract. In Elizabeth's time they were paid in cash, and apparently at the end of every three months (p. 296). It may, of course, be represented as an abominable injustice that they were not paid down every Friday night, as the hands in a modern factory; but that is not the custom of the navy, as to sea-going ships, even now, and still less was it so then ; there was no clerical organization by which it could have been done, and as the men had no expectation of it, there was no hardship. After the battle, and during the fearful mortality at Dover—a mortality which even in the Ark and Triumph and Victory seems to have exceeded 35 per cent. of the ships' companies (vol. ii.—Hawkyns to Burghley, Sept. 4) —they demanded to be paid for the month ending on the 25th of August, and were greatly discontented that they had not received in full what was already due to them (vol. ii.—Howard to the Council, Aug. 22 ; Hawkyns to Burghley, Aug. 26). As the Treasurer of the Navy had been busy fighting and attending to the welfare of his own men, the delay does not necessarily imply any gross depravity or dishonesty on his part.

The system of pay in force throughout the century was peculiar. Many of the details are still obscure, but the broad principle was that—with the exception of the captain—every man on board, independent of his quality, should receive the same pay, the amount received by the officers being increased by allowances given under the name of 'dead-shares' or 'rewards.' Out of this had grown the custom to calculate the total amount payable to a ship's company at an average per head, which, in the earlier years of Elizabeth's reign, was 9*s.* 4*d.*¹ for the month of 28 days ; but in 1586, consequent on a representation from Hawkyns (vol. ii. App. D), it was raised to 14*s.*, and at this rate it remained in 1588. The uniform pay of every man was thus raised from 6s. 8*d.* to 10s., the allowances being increased in the same proportion. As the nominal pay of the captain was thus brought up to 2s. 6*d.* per diem, it follows that previous to 1586 it was 1s. 8*d.* In addition to this, however, he had some allowance for his table; possibly also for lights, &c.; the whole, lumped together, formed his diet,¹ or daily pay, the amount of which varied, according to the size of the ship, and the circumstances of his command.

With this one exception, every man on board received the same uniform pay of 10s. a month; but an indeterminate number of non-existent men, known as 'dead-shares,' were also allotted 10s. a month; and these dead-shares were divided amongst the officers and petty officers, according to some scale not yet known. The master and the master-gunner seem to have each received a whole dead-share; so also probably did the boatswain; quarter-masters had half a dead-share, some of the gunners—the modern gunner's-mates—one-third. In addition to these, further payments were made under the name of 'rewards,' concerning which there seems to have been no regulation; the disbursement was probably determined partly by custom, partly by personal bargain, and partly at the discretion of the captain; though, judging by the light of later experience, there must have been some machinery for preventing his assigning an exceedingly large reward to himself.

It would appear certain that, according to the class of ship, a large 'reward' was assigned to the master, who was, in most cases, a man of high standing and great responsibility. In the larger ships commanded by Howard's 'noblemen,' he was virtually the captain; in the Ark he must have been actually so; so also in the E. Bonaventure, which was commanded by Raymond before the Earl of Cumberland joined her off Portsmouth, and after he left her at Harwich. Towards the end of the season Thomas Gray, the master of the Ark, commanded a small squadron with the pay of 6*s.* 8*d.* a day, besides probable allowances, and the style of rear-admiral (vol.ii.—Scale of pay). It is not to be supposed that these men served for the nominal 20*s.* a month, pay and dead-share, or for anything like it, when lieutenants had their pay made up to 3*l.*, and chaplains to 3*l.* 10*s.* (vol. ii.—Hawkyns to Burghley, Estimate No. 5, Sept. 12). It is suggested (p. 173 n.) that Polwhele was promoted from being captain of a small vessel to be master of a large one, the understanding being that the master's pay and reward in a large ship was really higher than the captain's diet in a small one.

The Lord Admiral's pay is returned as 3*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.*, or 5 marks, a day, besides unknown allowances. Seymour's daily pay was 2*l.*; that of Drake was 30*s.* In early times the pay of an admiral or general largely depended on his social rank or title. Howard's rank was of the highest, and to it he owed the honourable position he occupied at this critical period. He had indeed served at sea, and had more experience than fell to the lot of most admirals, but it must not be supposed that it was on that account that he was made Lord High Admiral of England. It was rather because his father and two of his father's brothers had previously been Lord High Admirals ; it was because both he and his wife were nearly related to the Queen ; it was because by birth or marriage he was related to or connected with almost every person of importance in the kingdom.

The Howards of the sixteenth century were remarkable by their high position, their political influence, their brilliant services, and in a scarcely less degree by their extreme fecundity. Most of them married twice ; most of them had large families, so that the number of people, men and women, who could claim near relationship with the Lord Admiral was enormous. Thomas, the second Duke of Norfolk, who commanded the English army at the battle of Flodden, had five sisters ; he was twice married, and had issue ten sons and six daughters. One of the sons, William, created Lord Howard of Effingham, was twice married, and had issue, besides six daughters, two sons, the elder of whom, Charles, born in 1536, succeeded as second Lord Howard of Effingham in 1573 ; was appointed Lord High Admiral in 1585 ; commanded the fleet against the armada of Spain in 1588, and at the taking of Cadiz in 1596, when he was created Earl of Nottingham. He retained the office of Lord High Admiral till 1619, and did not die till 1624, preserving his faculties to the last. Elizabeth Howard, one of the six sisters of the first Lord Howard of Effingham, married Sir Thomas Boleyn, and was the mother of Mary and Anne Boleyn. Anne married Henry VIII. and was the mother of Elizabeth. Mary married William Carey, and was the mother of Henry, created Lord Hunsdon, whose daughter, Catherine, married Charles, Lord Howard of Effingham.

This relationship is more satisfactorily shown by a table, which—omitting the other members of the very numerous families—appears thus :—

One of Lord Howard's sisters married Edward Seymour, Earl of Hertford, eldest son of the Protector, Duke of Somerset, whose second son, Henry Seymour, commanded the squadron in the Narrow Seas through the summer of 1588, and wrote many of the letters contained in these volumes. Of the other men who served in the fleet of 1588, Lord Thomas Howard, captain of the Golden Lion, was son of the fourth Duke of Norfolk and grandson of Lord Howard's first cousin, the Earl of Surrey, executed in 1545. Lord Sheffield, captain of the White Bear, was the son of Howard's sister Douglas, who, after her first husband's death, married Sir Edward Stafford, but retained the style of Lady Sheffield. Sir Robert Southwell, who commanded the Elizabeth Jonas, had married one of Howard's daughters; another had married Richard Leveson, then serving as a volunteer in the Ark, but afterwards Vice-Admiral of England. Sir Edward Hoby, who was also with Howard in the Ark, had married his youngest sister-in-law, daughter of Lord Hunsdon. The appointment of all these men, without any knowledge or experience of the sea, to posts of high command, would now-a-days be called nepotism. In Howard's days it was the rule for men in office to make the public service provide for their families; and Howard would certainly have defended his right to do so on the ground that he knew his kinsmen and could depend on them. It was the custom of the age for landsmen of high rank to command afloat, and under the conditions of the navy at that time they did very well.

But men like Drake, Wynter, Hawkyns, Palmer, Frobiser, Fenner, Fenton, Luke Ward and many others, come into a different category. They had followed the sea from their boyhood, and though all men of respectable or even good family, were, by the necessities of their education and calling, of a different social rank from the others. Drake belonged to the family of Drake of Ash in Devon, and was born at Tavistock about 1540. Hawkyns, some years older, and of a family rising to wealth by trade and maritime adventure, was a native of Plymouth. The relationship between them would seem to have been on the mother's side, for Drake had family arms, Hawkyns had not. After his loss at San Juan de Lua Hawkyns retired from the sea. He had married the daughter of Gonson, the Treasurer of the Navy, and in due time succeeded him in his office, in which—according to the statements of his enemies—he enriched himself by irregular, if not by fraudulent methods. Some of these charges, which had been persistently made, are repeated here (pp. 34-44; vol. ii. Oct. 8), but the evidence does not seem to have been sifted; and the fact that the ships were found strong and seaworthy when they were wanted for service (pp. 79, 81) goes far to show that it was mainly the voice of spite or malice. After the defeat of the armada Hawkins commanded an expedition to the coast of Portugal in 1590, and later, under Drake, in the West Indies, where—off Porto Rico—he died on the 12th of November, 1595.

Drake's career was much more active and brilliant than that of his older kinsman. Hawkins laid the foundation of a large fortune by cheating the Spaniards, and increased it, it was suspected, by cheating his own countrymen. Drake also founded a handsome fortune at the cost of the Spaniards, but it was by openly plundering them in what he and the generality of Englishmen considered legitimate and honourable war. After his return from the celebrated voyage round the world in 1580, he was not at sea except in the Queen's service. In 1585-6 he commanded a strong squadron which ravaged the West Indies, sacked Cartagena and the Spanish settlements on the mainland of Florida; and in April 1587, with another squadron, forced his way into Cadiz, where he burnt the ships which were preparing for the intended invasion of England, and struck terror into the Spaniards and Portuguese along the coast. William Borough, the second in command of the squadron—a man distinguished as a navigator and hydrographer, but of no experience in war—was aghast at what appeared the Admiral's recklessness, and remonstrated against his conduct in very strong terms. Drake answered by putting him under arrest on board his own ship. Borough believed, or pretended to believe, that his life was in danger, and not improbably worked on his men to run away with the ship and return to England. The quarrel was afterwards smoothed over by the influence of Burghley (pp. 74–5), and Borough commanded the galley Bonavolia through the summer of 1588, when his best service was sketching a chart of the Thames, which is here reproduced in facsimile, though smaller (p. 337). Borough's name still lives, not as that of a warrior, but of a navigator, hydrographer, and early investigator into the apparent vagaries of the compass.

In 1589 Drake, jointly with Sir John Norreys, commanded a powerful armament against Lisbon in support of the claims of Dom Antonio to the throne of Portugal. They met no enemy by sea; on shore they met the most terrible of all enemies—a wasting and deadly sickness—and, having lost many thousand men, returned helpless to England. In 1595 he was again afloat on an expedition to the West Indies. No secrecy had been preserved in fitting it out, and the Spaniards, forewarned, had everywhere prepared for it, either by removing their treasure or strengthening their defences. An attack on Porto Rico failed, and though Santa Marta, Nombre de Dios, and some other places were burnt, little harm was done and no advantage gained. The disappointment preyed on his spirits and aggravated an attack of dysentery, which proved fatal on the 28th of January, 1596.

Frobiser, of an old Yorkshire family, seems in early life to have been engaged in trading to the Mediterranean. He was afterwards suspected of piracy, though the charge was not brought home to him ; and in 1576-7-8 he made thrée successive voyages to the Arctic, where his name still lives in 'Frobiser's Strait,' now known to be only a deep inlet or gulf. In 1585-6 he was with Drake in the West Indies, in 1590 with Hawkyns on the coast of Portugal. In 1594 he commanded a squadron on the coast of Brittany, co-operating with Norreys, and in an attack on Crozon was mortally wounded. He died at Plymouth in the early days of January 1595. Though he played a foremost part in the campaign of 1588, both as a councillor and as captain of the Triumph, the largest ship in the fleet, and everywhere in the front of battle, there is not one letter from him among the papers here printed. The fact is that though a bold and skilful seaman, a good navigator, and a man of cultivated intelligence, he had neglected the more ordinary paths of book learning, and could do little more than write his name, which—after trying various other forms—he decided on spelling Frobiser.

Of the volunteers who joined the fleet after the Spaniards came into the Channel little can be said. According to Camden, they were:—The Earls of Oxford, Northumberland, and Cumberland ; Thomas and Robert Cecil ; H. Brook, Charles Blount, Walter Raleigh, William Hatton, Robert Carey, Ambrose Willoughby, Thomas Gerard, Arthur Gorges, and others. Of these, only three are mentioned in these papers as having joined the fleet:—the Earl of Cumberland, Charles Blount, and Thomas Gerard. Robert Cecill was at Dover, writing to his father (p. 342), and, on the 30th of July, neither was nor had been on board any of the ships. That Oxford, Burghley's son-in-law, or Thomas Cecill, Burghley's son; that Northumberland, Seymour's first cousin; Robert Carey, Howard's brother-in-law, and Sir Walter Raleigh, a man of high repute and official rank, could be in the fleet and not be once mentioned by Howard, by Robert Cecill, by Seymour, or by any of the correspondents of Burghley and Walsyngham, or by these, would seem incredible if we had not Robert Carey's own statement to the effect that, at the battle of Gravelines, he was on board the E. Bonaventure.¹ It must therefore be admitted as possible that the others were also in the fleet, though—without corroborative testimony—it remains extremely improbable. That Raleigh had a command in the fleet and 'led a squadron as rear-admiral'² is virtually contradicted by the evidence now before us.

Another man who, though neither in nor belonging to the fleet, is often said to have rendered efficient service, is David Gwynn, actually a slave on board the Spanish galley Diana, but described as serving on board the Bazana. On the way from Lisbon, in heavy weather off Cape Finisterre, the Diana—it is said—went down with all hands. The other three galleys were in great danger, and the captain of the Bazana applied to Gwynn, whom he knew as an experienced seaman, to get them out of the mess. Gwynn consented, and as a first step desired that the soldiers should be sent below. Most of them were so sent; whereupon Gwynn, waving his cap as a signal, struck his dagger into the heart of the captain. His comrades, at the same moment and in the same manner, killed all the Spaniards who were on deck; then they killed all who were below; and having thus obtained possession of the Bazana, they attacked and won the Capitana, killing all the Spaniards on board. The fourth galley, the Princesa, made her escape, and succeeded in rejoining the fleet and getting into Corunna.

Such in brief is the story, absolutely unknown to early English and Spanish writers, which is told by the Dutch chroniclers, and has been repeated from them by later historians, notably by Motley,¹ who ought to have been warned by the many absurdities, such as the slaves being unchained and all having daggers. For, in point of fact, the story is a lie from beginning to end. Gwynn, as has been said, was serving in the Diana, not the Bazana. It was after the fleet left Corunna, not before it arrived there; it was in the Bay of Biscay, not off Cape Finisterre, that the galleys made such bad weather of it. The Diana did not go down in the open sea, but bore up for Bayonne, where in trying to run into the harbour she ran aground and became a total wreck, but without any serious loss of life. The officers and men were entertained by the governor of the town, and went home by land. The other three galleys, with better success, put into different French ports and in due time returned to Spain.¹ Gwynn and some other English slaves, in the confusion following the wreck, made their escape, got to Rochelle and thence to England; whence, as speaking Spanish, Gwynn was sent over to Ireland to assist in the examination of the Spanish prisoners. His true story is told clearly enough by the Lord Deputy (vol. ii.—Fytzwylliam to the Council, October 18). It is, perhaps, not impossible that Gwynn, after being ignominiously sent out of Ireland as a liar, a thief, and a lewd person, sought service in the Low Countries, where he spun his 'galley-yarns' to the credulous, from whom Bor received them. It is not often that a fable can be so completely exploded as this now is.

Of the many other myths which have been foisted on to the true history of the campaign, it is unnecessary to speak. The first test of their truth ought to be an examination of the evidence on which they are based. It will be found that many of them rest on no evidence at all, and others on that of the Dutch chroniclers, more especially Bor. It must be remembered that Dutch writers had no special facilities for knowing what happened; that they were by no means crushed under a sense of gratitude to Elizabeth, and were bitterly hostile to the Spaniards. English and Spanish writers—Camden, for instance, and Herrera—might be as badly informed, but the spirit of hatred was not so dominant in them. They were willing to do their enemies justice.

The papers here printed are strictly what they are called on the title-page—State Papers ; letters and memoranda written by or to the officers of the fleet and the high officers of State. A large proportion of the letters are written by Howard or Seymour to Lord Burghley, the Lord High Treasurer, or to Sir Francis Walsyngham, the Principal Secretary of State. Many, too, are written by Drake and by Hawkyns ; others by men not so well known, but all of unquestionable authenticity. About one document alone is any doubt possible, the Relation on pp. 1–18. As stated in the note on p. 1, there are strong reasons to suppose that it emanated from Howard ; but it is quite possible that it did not, and was only written from hearsay. If so, the writer was curiously well informed on points of detail which were not then public property.

Many of the letters are extremely difficult to read. Howard's writing is singularly perplexing ; Seymour's is very bad ; Drake's is a scrawl ; Walsyngham's is atrocious. But the badness of the writing is not the worst part of them. Many of them, especially of the most interesting and important, have been very badly treated, carried about in pockets, opened and folded, read and re-read, till the edges and the folds were much frayed and torn. More than two centuries of damp afterwards tried to wash away what remained, and have too often very nearly succeeded. In 1798, John Bruce, the Keeper of State Papers, was directed by Mr. Pitt, in view of possibilities then threatening, to prepare a Report on the measures taken for the defence of the country in 1588. To his Report Bruce appended many of these documents, which he certified as examined. Since that time the papers have suffered still more from damp, sometimes also from bad mending, and no doubt many words now wanting were then still legible. The Report was thus a natural reference in cases of difficulty, but a very little experience of it showed that the transcripts were made by a very ignorant and careless man, and that, notwithstanding the official certificate, the value of them is extremely slight. With the present copies every practicable care has been taken to ensure verbal accuracy ; and though it is impossible to affirm that there are no errors, it is confidently believed that there are not many, and none of serious importance. Words which might be thought doubtful are in all cases enclosed in square brackets, and if supplied from Bruce's Report or from conjecture, the fact is duly noted.

In accordance with the resolution of the Council, the spelling has been modernised ; but wherever the original spelling seemed to have any interest, either from the social position of the writer or from its peculiar eccentricity, it is given in a note. Howard's spelling is sometimes very curious, but apparently phonetic, and is thus a guide to the Court pronunciation, as Cely's still more extraordinary spelling may be to that of middle-class society in Bristol. Obsolete or obscure words and phrases or allusions have been also noted, the Editor being instructed to act on the supposition that many members of the Society have little practice in Elizabethan English, and have not ready access to the larger works of reference, such as the New English Dictionary (N.E.D.) or the Dictionary of National Biography (D.N.B.).

Names of men are spelt uniformly, and, wherever practicable, according to their own signatures. It is commonly supposed that the spelling of 16th and 17th century names is indeterminate : a mistake, due partly to the carelessness of other people, but still more to what seems now the curious custom of brothers, or members of the same family, differencing their names by the spelling, in much the same way that they differenced their armorial bearings by marks of cadency. Humphrey Gylberte and John Gilberte, Thomas Cecill and—after his father's death—Robert Cecyll, Marmaduke Darell and his cousin William Darrell, are some amongst many belonging to this period. The point is really one of some importance, for attention to the spelling of signatures is frequently the only way of avoiding great confusion ; as, for instance, between George Cary of Cockington, afterwards Lord Deputy of Ireland, George Carey of the Isle of Wight, afterwards Lord Hunsdon, and George Carew, Master of the Ordnance in Ireland, afterwards Earl of Totness. Each of these men, and indeed every man who could write, had an established signature, which he no more thought of varying than does anyone at the present time ; whether his peculiar spelling was dictated by reason or fancy, it marks his name, and as such, the Council has directed it to be used.

With the exception of a very few in the British Museum, with the distinguishing reference B.M., and of one at Hatfield, now abstracted from the Report of the Historical MSS. Commission, all the papers here given are in the Public Record Office, mostly in the collection of Domestic State Papers. The exact reference is in all cases given. They are arranged in nearly strict chronological order, the occasional slight deviations from it readily explaining themselves. The editorial dates at the head of the papers, in the notes and in this Introduction, are, without exception, according to the Old Style, then in use in England. The New Style, already adopted in France, Spain, and the Low Countries, which occasionally appears in the body of a document, differed by ten days from the Old. Thus the 20th of May O.S. was 30th of May N.S. ; the 21st of July O.S. was 31st of July N.S. ; and the 29th of July O.S. was the 8th of August N.S., which un-English date Sir Oswald Brierley has affixed to the engraving of his delightful picture of the battle of Gravelines. The legal and official year in England began on the 25th of March ; but in historical writing it was frequently supposed to begin on the 1st of January, as it did on the Continent. The date 1587 affixed to the letters written between the 1st of January and the 25th of March, is historically, and according to modern usage, 1588.

Most of the papers are, of course, in English. Some, originally in other languages, have been preserved in a contemporary translation, and are referred to as 'Englished.' Others, which remain only in the original language, are referred to as 'Latin,' 'French,' &c., and have been translated by the Editor, who has endeavoured to avoid the incongruity of appearing to put new cloth to an old garment.

It only remains for the Editor to express his grateful sense of the kindness which he has received from the many friends and some strangers whom he has consulted on doubtful or obscure points. He would record his obligations to his colleague at King's College, Professor J. W. Hales ; to Mr. M. Oppenheim ; to the Hydrographer, Captain Wharton, R.N., F.R.S. ; to Mr. C. H. Coote of the British Museum ; to M. Alfred Spont ; to Mr. Hubert Hall of the Record Office ; to the Director of Naval Intelligence, Rear-Admiral Bridge, who has assisted him in revising the proof-sheets, and in a very special degree to Mr. Edward Salisbury of the Record Office, to whose tireless generosity and marvellous skill in piecing out words from the faintest conceivable indications the accuracy of the present transcripts is largely due.

DEFEAT OF THE SPANISH ARMADA

A RELATION OF PROCEEDINGS.¹

[B.M. Cotton, Julius, F. x. ff. 111-117.—No date, title, signature, or endorsement. A neat, clerkly, contemporary writing.]

WHEREAS the Queen's most excellent Majesty had of late years sundry and most certain intelligences of the great warlike preparation both for sea and land which the King of Spain of late years made from all parts, not only of the mightiest and most puissant ships and vessels that he could prepare, as well from foreign places as in his own dominions, and by arresting of the ships of other countries that came into his dominions, but also of all kind of munition and victuals, and of captains, soldiers and mariners, and of all other provisions for a mighty army by seas, to come out of Spain and Portugal; for the more strength whereof it was notorious to the world how he had drawn into Spain and Portugal his principal and most experimented captains and old soldiers out of Naples, Sicilia, Lombardy and other parts of Italy, yea, and from sundry remote places of the Indies; the preparation whereof, with the numbers of ships, men, victuals, ordnance and all kind of munition, was made patent to the world by sundry books printed and published both in Spain, Portugal, and in many other countries of Christendom, carrying the titles of the 'Happy Armada' ¹ of the King of Spain, and in some specially expressed to be against England: And in like sort, where ² her Majesty had the like knowledge of the mighty and puissant forces of horses and footmen sufficient to make many armies prepared in the Low Countries under the conduct of the Duke of Parma, the King's Lieutenant-General, and of multitude of ships, bylanders, ³ boats and other vessels fit for the transporting and landing of the said forces, armies from the coast of Flanders, with a general publication to the world that all these so mighty forces, both by sea and land, were intended to the invasion of her Majesty's realms, and as was pretended, to have made therewith a full conquest: Yet for that, in this time of their preparation, the King of Spain, by his Lieutenant-General, the Duke of Parma, caused certain offers to be made to her Majesty for a communication of a peace betwixt their Majesties; howsoever, by the common judgment of the world, the same was done but to abuse her Majesty and to win time whilst his preparations might be made complete; her Majesty, nevertheless, like a most godly and christian prince, did not refuse to give ear to so christian an¹ offer, for which purpose she sent certain noblemen of her privy council into Flanders to treat with certain commissioners, who continued there without any good success by reason of the unreasonable delays of the King's commissioners; yea, they continued there until the navy of Spain was overcome and forced to fly.

And yet, notwithstanding this her inclination to peace, and her princely offers of most reasonable conditions of peace, she, like a prince of wisdom and magnanimity, for defence of herself, her realm and people, was not negligent of her princely office to which God called her, and wherein He had stablished her and preserved her very many years, but providently did prepare a princely and strong army by sea, and put in readiness also sundry armies by land, to prevent and withstand the foresaid attempts so published to be made by such great armies, both by sea and land, as never were so great made in any part of Christendom, either by the said King or the Emperor, his father. For which, her preparations by seas, such diligence was used, as the same being begun to be made but about the 1st of November, yet the same was fully ready to take the seas by the 20th of December, a time very short for such an enterprise, having respect to the length of sundry years which the Spanish navy was in preparing.

But yet such it was as God specially favoured, and as the force thereof hath been proved to have overmatched the mightiness of the enemy's navy; the charge whereof was committed by her Majesty to Charles Lord Howard, of the ancient house of Norfolk, High Admiral of England, who was accompanied with a great number of noblemen and others, the most sufficient and best experimented men for the seas. And after that he had continued a good time with the army upon the Narrow Seas betwixt England and Flanders, the said High Admiral, by her Majesty's commandment, sent Sir Francis Drake into the west part of this realm towards Spain, with certain of her Majesty's ships, and other ships of the subjects of the realm, to the number of fifty sail great and small, there to continue until such time as the Lord Admiral, with a great and strong force, should repair thither, if occasion should so require. And in the meantime, the Lord Admiral, with the Lord Henry Seymour, vice-admiral of that army, and many noblemen and gentlemen having charge of sundry of her Majesty's ships, continued in the Narrow Seas, having to attend upon them 20 ships of the city of London, very well and in good sort sent out, and sundry other good ships for the war which the coast towns, from the River of Thames to Newcastle northward, did send out for this service in warlike manner.

And then, upon further intelligence of the readiness of the Armada of Spain to come to the seas, the 21st of May, 1588,¹ the Lord Admiral, leaving the Lord Henry Seymour in the Narrow Seas, with a convenient force both of her Majesty's ships and of her subjects', to withstand all enterprises that the Duke of Parma should make by sea, did depart from the Downs towards the west with certain of her Majesty's ships and twenty other ships and barks of London, which arrived at Plymouth the 23rd of the same, where Sir Francis Drake, with the number of 60 sails, until that time under his charge, met¹ with the Lord Admiral in good order, whereupon his Lordship, commanding that fleet unto his own, made Sir Francis Drake his vice-admiral.

His Lordship, upon his arrival at Plymouth, took present order for the victualling and putting in a readiness of the whole army, being then near about the number of 90 sails of ships and barks; which being accomplished, his Lordship put out of harbour again into the sea, and lay off and on in the Sleeve,² betwixt Ushant and Scilly, abiding the coming of the Spanish fleet; and afterwards his Lordship having spent long time, sometimes near the coast of France, and sometimes near the coast of England, retired with the fleet to Plymouth to refresh them.

In the meantime there were discovered betwixt Ushant and Scilly certain ships of the Spanish fleet, to the number of 14 sail, which afterward were known to be separated from their fleet by force of foul weather, and before they could be met with by any of the English army, they had a northerly wind which carried them back to the Groyne,³ whither the rest of the fleet returned and watered. Hereupon his Lordship had intelligences sundry ways that the Spanish army was dispersed into sundry ports of Spain, distressed, spoiled, in necessity of victuals and great mortality grown amongst their people; which notwithstanding did not so fall out in truth ; where-upon his Lordship, seeing our own coast clear and the coast of France also, which he had very narrowly searched, thought it good, with liking and advice of his council, to take the opportunity of the next north wind that should happen, and to bear with the coast of Spain, there to seek out the Spanish fleet in the Groyne or other ports of Galicia, which course was held from the 8th of July, 1588, until the 10th of the same, with a north wind, at which time the same changed to southerly, 40 leagues short of the coast of Spain, or thereabouts. His Lordship therefore, doubting that which afterwards fell out in very deed, and having his chief care and regard to the defence of the realm of England, and finding that with that wind the enemy might pass by the fleet of England undescried, with that change of wind being prosperous for the fleet of Spain to come for the coast of England, returned with his whole company and arrived at Plymouth the 12th of the same, where, with great expedition, his Lordship put divers things in order, watered and refreshed his ships with victuals.

² The Sleeve (Fr. La Manche) is more properly the Channel. It will be seen, however, that Howard, like this unknown writer, always applies it to the Chops of the Channel, the sea between Ushant and Scilly.

The 19th of July, 1588, we had intelligence by one of the barks that his Lordship had left in the Sleeve for discovery, named the [Golden Hind],¹ wherein was Captain Thomas Flemyng, that the fleet of Spain was seen near the Lizard, the wind being then southerly or south-west ; and although the greater number of ships of the English army, being then in Plymouth, with that wind were very hard to be gotten out of harbour, yet the same was done with such diligence and good will, that many of them got abroad as though it had been with a fair wind. Whereupon, the 20th of July, his Lordship, accompanied with 54 sail of his fleet, with that south-west wind plied out of the Sound; and being gotten out scarce so far as Eddystone,¹ the Spanish army was discovered, and were apparently seen of the whole fleet to the westwards as far as Fowey.

The next morning, being Sunday, the 21st of July, 1588, all the English ships that were then come out of Plymouth had recovered the wind of the Spaniards two leagues to the westward of Eddystone,¹ and about 9 of the clock in the morning, the Lord Admiral sent his pinnace,² named the Disdain, to give the Duke of Medina defiance, and afterward in the Ark bare up with the admiral³ of the Spaniards wherein the Duke was supposed to be, and fought with her until she was rescued by divers ships of the Spanish army. In the meantime, Sir Francis Drake, Sir John Hawkyns,⁴ and Sir Martin Frobiser⁴ fought with the galleon of Portugal, wherein John Martinez de Recalde, vice-admiral, was supposed to be. The fight was so well maintained for the time that the enemy was constrained to give way and to bear up room⁵ to the eastward, in which bearing up, a great galleon, wherein Don Pedro de Valdes was captain, became foul of another ship which spoiled and bare overboard his foremast and bowsprit,¹ whereby he could not keep company with their fleet, but being with great dishonour left behind by the Duke, fell into our hands. There was also at that instant a great Biscayan, of 800 tons or thereabouts, that, by firing of a barrel of gunpowder, had her decks blown up, her stern blown out, and her steerage spoiled. This ship was for this night carried amongst the fleet by the galleasses.

This fight continued not above two hours; for the Lord Admiral, considering there were forty sail of his fleet as yet to come from Plymouth, thought good to stay² their coming before he would hazard the rest too far,³ and therefore set out a flag of council, where his Lordship's considerate advice was much liked of, and order delivered unto each captain how to pursue the fleet of Spain; and so, dismissing each man to go aboard his own ship, his Lordship appointed Sir Francis Drake to set the watch that night.

This night the Spanish fleet bare alongst by the Start, and the next day, in the morning, they were as far to leeward as the Berry. Our own fleet, being disappointed of their light, by reason that Sir Francis Drake left the watch to pursue certain hulks which were descried⁴ very late in the evening, lingered behind not knowing whom to follow; only his Lordship, with the Bear and the Mary Rose in his company, somewhat in his stern, pursued the enemy all night within culverin shot; his own fleet being as far behind as,⁵ the next morning, the nearest might scarce be seen half mast high, and very many out of sight, which with a good sail recovered not his Lordship the next day before it was very late in the evening. This day, Sir Francis Drake with the Revenge, the Roebuck and a small bark or two in his company, took Don Pedro de Valdes, which was spoiled of his mast the day before; and having taken out Don Pedro and certain other gentlemen, sent away the same ship and company to Dartmouth, under the conduction of the Roebuck, and himself bare with the Lord Admiral, and recovered his Lordship that night, being Monday.

This Monday, being the 22nd of July, 1588, the Spaniards abandoned the ship that the day before was spoiled by fire, to the which his Lordship sent the Lord Thomas Howard and Sir John Hawkyns, knight, who together, in a small skiff of the Victory's, went aboard her, where they saw a very pitiful sight—the deck of the ship fallen down, the steerage broken, the stern blown out, and about 50 poor creatures burnt with powder in most miserable sort.¹ The stink in the ship was so unsavoury, and the sight within board so ugly, that the Lord Thomas Howard and Sir John Hawkyns shortly departed and came unto the Lord Admiral to inform his Lordship in what case she was found; whereupon his Lordship took present order that a small bark named the Bark Flemyng,² wherein was Captain Thomas Flemyng, should conduct her to some port in England which he could best recover, which was performed, and the said ship brought into Weymouth the next day.

That night fell very calm, and the four galleasses singled themselves out from their fleet, whereupon some doubt was had lest in the night they might have distressed some of our small ships which were short of our fleet, but their courage failed them, for they attempted nothing.

The next morning, being Tuesday, the 23rd of July, 1588, the wind sprang up at north-east, and then the Spaniards had the wind of the English army, which stood in to the north-westward, towards the shore. So did the Spaniards also. But that course was not good for the English army to recover the wind of the Spaniards, and therefore they cast about to the eastwards; whereupon the Spaniards bare room, offering [to] board our ships. Upon which coming room there grew a great fight. The English ships stood fast and abode their coming, and the enemy, seeing us to abide them, and divers of our ships to stay for them, as the Ark, the Nonpareil, the Elizabeth Jonas, the Victory, &c., and divers other ships, they were content to fall astern of the Nonpareil, which was the sternmost ship.

In the meantime, the Triumph, with five ships, viz., the Merchant Royal, the Centurion, the Margaret and John, the Mary Rose and the Golden Lion, were so far to leeward and separated from our fleet, that the galleasses took courage and bare room with them and assaulted them sharply. But they were very well resisted by those ships for the space of an hour and a half. At length certain of her Majesty's ships bare with them, and then the galleasses forsook them. The wind then shifted to the south-eastwards and so to SSW, at what time a troop of her Majesty's ships and sundry merchants' assailed the Spanish fleet so sharply to the westward that they were all forced to give way and to bear room; which his Lordship perceiving, together with the distress that the Triumph and the five merchant ships in her company were in, called unto certain of her Majesty's ships then near at hand and charged them straitly to follow him, and to set freshly upon the Spaniards, and to go within musket-shot of the enemy before they should discharge any one piece of ordnance, thereby to succour the Triumph; which was very well performed by the Ark, the Elizabeth Jonas, the Galleon of Leicester, the Golden Lion, the Victory, the Mary Rose, the Dreadnought and the Swallow—for so they went in order into the fight. Which the Duke of Medina perceiving, came out with 16 of his best galleons, to impeach his Lordship and to stop him from assisting of the Triumph. At which assault, after wonderful sharp conflict, the Spaniards were forced to give way and to flock together like sheep. In this conflict one William Coxe,¹ captain of a small pinnace of Sir William Wynter's, named the Delight, showed himself most valiant in the face of his enemies at the hottest of the encounter, where² afterwards lost his life in the service with a great shot. Towards the evening, some four or five ships of the Spanish fleet edged out of the south-westwards, where some other of our ships met them, amongst which [the] Mayflower of London dis-

² 'Where' must be a clerical error for 'who.' Camden, referring probably to a copy of this Relation, says, 'Solus Cockus Anglus, in sua inter medios hostes navicula, cum laude perit;' and this has been repeated over and over again by English, French, and Spanish writers. But it will be seen (post, August 1, Wynter to Walsyngham) that he was alive on July 29, and that the 'navicula' was Wynter's. Motley describes his 'Wilton' as killed in boarding the great galleass. But Coxe was killed by a great shot, and Wynter's expression 'who sithen that time is slain,' clearly puts his death later. He was probably slain in the fight off Gravelines.

This fight was very nobly continued from morning until evening, the Lord Admiral being always [in] the hottest of the encounter, and it may well be said that for the time there was never seen a more terrible value of great shot, nor more hot fight than this was; for although the musketeers and harquebusiers of crock¹ were then infinite, yet could they not be discerned nor heard for that the great ordnance came so thick that a man would have judged it to have been a hot skirmish of small shot,² being all the fight long within half musket shot of the enemy.

This great fight being ended, the next day, being Wednesday, the 24th of July, 1588, there was little done, for that in the fight on Sunday and Tuesday much of our munition had been spent, and therefore the Lord Admiral sent divers barks and pinnaces unto the shore for a new supply of such provisions. This day the Lord Admiral divided his fleet into four squadrons, whereof he appointed the first to attend himself; the second his Lordship committed to the charge of Sir Francis Drake; the third to Sir John Hawkyns, and the fourth to Sir Martin Frobiser. This afternoon his Lordship gave order that, in the night, six merchant ships out of every squadron should set upon the Spanish fleet in sundry places, at one instant, in the night time, to keep the enemy waking ; but all that night fell out to be so calm that nothing could be done.

¹ The harquebus was a very heavy sort of musket, fired from a rest or crock. The word 'crock' is still in use, in the sense of 'a little stool.'

² 'The shot continued so thick together that it might rather have been judged a skirmish with small shot on land than a fight with great shot on sea.' This is Sir George Carey's account of this action, in his letter to the Earl of Sussex, of July 25.

The next morning, being the 25th of July, 1588, there was a great galleon¹ of the Spaniards short of her company to the southwards. They of Sir John Hawkyns his squadron, being next, towed and recovered so near that the boats were beaten off with musket shot ; whereupon three of the galleasses and an armado² issued out of the Spanish fleet, with whom the Lord Admiral in the Ark, and the Lord Thomas Howard in the Golden Lion, fought a long time and much damaged them, that one of them was fain to be carried away upon the careen ; and another, by a shot from the Ark, lost her lantern, which came swimming by, and the third his nose. There was many good shots made by the Ark and Lion at the galleasses in the sight of both armies, which looked on and could not approach, it being calm, for the Ark and the Lion did tow to the galleasses with their long boats. At length it began to blow a little gale, and the Spanish fleet edged up to succour their galleasses, and so rescued them and the galleon, after which time the galleasses were never seen in fight any more, so bad was their entertainment in this encounter. Then the fleets drawing near one to another, there began some fight, but it continued not long, saving that the Nonpareil and the Mary Rose struck their topsails and lay awhile by the whole fleet of Spain very bravely, during which time the Triumph, to the northward of the Spanish fleet, was so far to leeward as, doubting that some of the Spanish army might weather her, she towed off with the help of sundry boats, and so recovered the wind. The Bear and the Elizabeth Jonas, perceiving her distress, bare with her for her rescue, and put themselves, through their hardiness, into like perils, but made their parties good notwithstanding, until they had recovered the wind; and so that day's fight ended, which was a very sharp fight for the time.

Now, forasmuch as our powder and shot was well wasted,¹ the Lord Admiral thought it was not good in policy to assail them any more until their coming near unto Dover, where he should find the army which he had left under the conduction of the Lord Henry Seymour and Sir William Wynter, knight, ready to join with his Lordship, whereby our fleet should be much strengthened, and in the meantime, better store of munition might be provided from the shore. On Friday, being the 26th of July, 1588, his Lordship, as well in reward of their good services in these former fights, as also for the encouragement of the rest, called the Lord Thomas Howard, the Lord Sheffield, Sir Roger Townshend, Sir Martin Frobiser and Sir John Hawkyns,² and gave them all the order of knighthood aboard the Ark. All this day and Saturday, being the 27th of July, the Spaniards went always before the English army like sheep, during which time the justices of peace near the sea-coast, the Earl of Sussex, Sir George Carey, and the captains of the forts and castles amongst the coast, sent us men, powder, shot, victuals and ships to aid and assist us. On Saturday, in the evening the Spanish fleet came near unto Calais on the coast of Picardy, and there suddenly came to an anchor over against betwixt Calais and Calais Cliffs,¹ and our English fleet anchored short of them within culverin shot of the enemy.

The Spaniards sent notice of their arrival presently unto the Duke of Parma, but because² there should be no time detracted³ to permit their forces to join, the Lord Admiral, the 28th of July, 1588, about midnight, caused eight ships to be fired and let drive amongst the Spanish fleet; whereupon they were forced to let slip or cut cables at half and to set sail. By reason of which fire the chief galleass came foul of another ship's cable and brake her rudder, by means whereof he was forced the next day to row ashore near the haven's mouth and town of Calais; whereupon the Lord Admiral sent his long boat, under the charge of Amyas Preston,⁴ gentleman, his lieutenant, and with him Mr. Thomas Gerrard⁵ and Mr. . . .⁶ Harvey, together with other gentlemen, his Lordship's followers and servants, who took her and had the spoil of her. There entered into her above 100 Englishmen. And for that she was aground and sewed¹ two foot, and could not be gotten off, they left her to Monsr. Gourdan, Captain of Calais, where she lieth sunk.

Now that the Lord Henry Seymour and Sir William Wynter were joined with us, our fleet was near about 140 sail—of ships, barks and pinnaces &c. During the time that this galleass was in taking by the Lord Admiral, Sir Francis Drake in the Revenge, accompanied with Mr. Thomas Fenner in the Nonpareil and the rest of his squadron, set upon the fleet of Spain and gave them a sharp fight. And within short time, Sir John Hawkyns in the Victory, accompanied with Mr. Edward Fenton² in the Mary Rose, Sir George Beeston in the Dreadnought, Mr. Richard Hawkyns³ in the Swallow, and the rest of the ships appointed to his squadron, bare with the midst of the Spanish army, and there continued an hot assault all that forenoon. Sir George Beeston behaved himself valiantly. This fight continued hotly; and then came the Lord Admiral, the Lord Thomas Howard, the Lord Sheffield, near the place where the Victory had been before, where these noblemen did very valiantly. Astern of these was a great galleon assailed by the Earl of Cumberland and Mr. George Raymond⁴ in the Bonaventure most worthily, and being also beaten with the Lord Henry Seymour in the Rain- bow, and Sir William Wynter in the Vanguard, yet she recovered into the fleet. Notwithstanding, that night she departed from the army and was sunk. After this, Mr. Edward Fenton in the Mary Rose and a galleon encountered each other, the one standing to the eastward and the other to the westward, so close as they could conveniently one pass by another, wherein the captain and company did very well. Sir Robert Southwell that day did worthily behave himself, as he had done many times before; so did Mr. Robert Crosse¹ in the Hope, and most of the rest of the captains and gentlemen. This day did the Lord Henry Seymour and Sir William Wynter so batter two of the greatest armados that they were constrained to seek the coast of Flanders, and were afterwards, being distressed and spoiled, taken by the Zealanders and carried into Flushing. In this fight it is known that there came to their end sundry of the Spanish ships, besides many other unknown to us.

After this Monday's fight, which was the 29th of July, 1588, the Lord Admiral on the 30th of July appointed the Lord Henry Seymour, Sir William Wynter and their fleet to return back again unto the Narrow Seas, to guard the coasts there, and himself, determining to follow the Spanish army with his fleet until they should come so far northward as the Frith in Scotland if they should bend themselves that way, thought good to forbear any more to assault them till he might see what they purposed to do, verily thinking that they would put into the Frith, where his Lordship had devised stratagems to make an end of them; but the Spaniards kept a course for the Isles of Scotland, and of purpose, to our seeming, to pass home that way, by the north of Scotland and west part of Ireland.

When we were come into 55 degrees and 13 minutes to the northward, 30 leagues east of Newcastle, the Lord Admiral determined¹ to fight with them again on the Friday, being the 2nd of August, but by some advice and counsel his Lordship stayed that determination, partly because we saw their course and meaning was only to get away that way to the northward to save themselves, and partly also for that many of our fleet were unprovided of victuals; for our supply, which her Majesty had most carefully provided and caused to be in readiness, knew not where to seek for us. It was therefore concluded that we should leave the Spanish fleet and direct our course for the Frith in Scotland, as well for the refreshing of our victuals as also for the performing of some other business which the Lord Admiral thought convenient to be done; but the wind coming contrary—viz. westerly—the next day the Lord Admiral altered his course and returned back again for England with his whole army, whereof some recovered the Downs, some Harwich and some Yarmouth, about the 7th of August, 1588.

¹ This is surely official optimism. It appears certain that he had little or no ammunition remaining.

Elizabeth, by the grace of God, &c., to all to whom &c., greeting :

Know ye that we, reposing special trust and confidence in the fidelity, prudence, zeal, experience, circumspection, industry and diligence of our beloved Councillor, Charles, Lord Howard, Baron of Effingham, knight of our illustrious order of the Garter, High Admiral of England, Ireland, Wales, and of the dominions and islands thereof, of the town of Calais and the marches of the same, of Normandy, Gascony and Aquitaine, and Captain General of the Navy and mariners of our said kingdoms of England and Ireland—do, by these presents, assign, make, constitute, ordain, and depute the said Charles to be our lieutenant-general, commander-in-chief, and governor of our whole fleet and army at sea,

December 22.—HOWARD TO BURGHLEY.

[ccvi. 42.—Signed. Addressed.]

My very good Lord :—I now remain aboard the Bear ; and as yet the provisions for the ships could not be taken all in by reason of the weather, which hath been so tempestuous as that no boats could lie aboard them to put in the same ; yet I hope that within two or three days all things will be in a readiness.

Here is a very sufficient and able company of sailors² as ever were seen ; and because their long journeys out of all places of this realm, and this bad season, makes them unprovided of apparel and such necessities, it were good for their relief to pay them one month's wages before hand.

Many great charges extraordinary hath grown this quarter, which I could hardly have believed unless with mine own eyes and good examination I had seen. Wherefore in respect of those causes, and for the furtherance of service, I am to entreat your good Lordship to give order that the rest of the warrant lately granted for the whole navy may be paid to Mr. Hawkyns, and 2,000*l.* more upon the old warrant of 29,000*l.* for the furnishing of those extraordinary charges, wherein your Lordship shall further a good service.

We have entered into sea victuals this day, being the 22nd of this instant December, and not before, for the preserving of the six weeks' victuals. And Mr. Quarles¹ hath sent down divers supplies more than allowance—for the numbers were great before we entered into the six weeks' victuals.² Wherefore I pray your Lordship that he may be paid the rest of his allowed warrant, and that consideration for the rest which I spake to your Lordship for heretofore. And so I bid your good Lordship most heartily farewell. From aboard the Bear, the 22nd of December, 1587.

Your Lordship's most assured loving friend to command,

December 24.—HOWARD TO BURGHLEY.

[B.M. Harl. MS. 6994, f. 102.—Holograph. Addressed.]

My honourable good Lord :—I do understand by Mr. Cæsar⁴ how much I am bound unto your Lordship for your honourable favour. I have no ways to recompense it but with my love and service, which your Lordship shall be most assured ever of.

It may be there hath been some report made to your Lordship of some chance⁵ that happened here, before my coming down, by fire in one of the ships ; and because I do understand that it is reported that it should be⁶ done by Ascott, I do assure your Lordship it was after this manner. There were two poor knaves that came from Westchester¹ that strived for a place to hang up their netting for to lie in, and the one of them had a piece of a candle in his hand, and in striving, the candle fell down where there lay some oakum. It might have bred some mischief, but it was quickly put out. It was in the Elizabeth Bonaventure; but I hope to make them a warning to others to beware.

² Though named in this list of captains, he had no experience of sea affairs, and did not command a ship either in 1588 or in any other year. He was knighted on July 26 (ante, p. 14), and was probably then serving on the personal staff of the Lord Admiral, but his name does not appear elsewhere in these papers. He died in 1590. His great-grandson, Horatio, was created a viscount after the Restoration.

I am bold to send you by this bearer, my man, the copy of a proclamation which I have drawn and proclaimed in my own ship, and shall be this day and to-morrow proclaimed in the rest. I am but a bad drawer of a proclamation, but it shall serve, I hope, for to prevent some ill that might happen.

My good Lord, this bearer, my man, shall always attend at the court, and shall attend on your Lordship always to know your pleasure, if you will command him anything unto me. And so, resting always most beholden unto your Lordship and most ready to do your Lordship any service, I humbly take my leave. Aboard her Majesty's good ship the White Bear, the 24th of December, 1587.

Your Lordship's most assured to command,
C. HOWARD.

January 18.—HAWKYNS TO BURGHLEY(?)

[ccviii. 14.—Holograph. No address nor endorsement.]

My bounden duty humbly remembered unto your good Lordship :—This day with God's favour I shall make an end of the pay to all such as be discharged through the navy, and have reduced them to the numbers your Lordship did appoint. The Revenge, the Swiftsure and the Aid's company were reduced to 320 men, as was appointed, and they departed and were well over the Land's End¹ the 16th day of this month, God be thanked.

Yesterday my Lord Admiral accompanied with the Lords went over the Land's End towards Dover, with the Vanguard, the Rainbow, and sundry of our small pinnaces ; and mindeth to see Dover, Harwich and other places, before his Lordship return. His abode, I think, will not be long ; for his Lordship also received special allowances under the name of rewards. The subject is more fully discussed in the Introduction.

told me he would return within four days, if weather served.

The treasure went over the 16th day of this present, accompanied with the Bull, the Tiger and the Charles ; so as there remaineth there at Queenborough 11 great ships, as followeth :—

As there shall be any occasion grow here worthy the writing I will inform your Lordship, and so humbly take my leave. From Queenborough aboard the Bonaventure, the 18th of January, 1587.

Your Lordship's humbly to command,

JOHN HAWKYNs.

THE AGREEMENT WITH MR. HAWKYNs.

[ccviii. 17.—Endorsed : Mr. Hawkyns, the conditions for the bargain for the Navy upon the dormant warrant for 5,714*l.* ; 1579.]

The bargain of John Hawkyns for the navy, viz. :

Conditions in the behalf of her Majesty.

1. First, all that which was ordinary in such time as it was 5,714*l.* yearly John Hawkyns shall perform :

2. As first.—To pay and continue the same number of ship-keepers that hath been since the said ordinary was reduced to the said sum of 5,714*l.* together with the same number of gunners in Upnor Castle, the clerks &c., the watchmen, and rent that now is paid in the ordinary.

3. Item.—To keep in repair all her Majesty's ships, so as, upon a grounding, they may be ready to serve at the seas, until some one of them come to be new made in a dry dock.¹

4. Item.—To moor the navy sufficiently, so that the ships may ride without danger.

5. Item.—To repair all manner of storehouses and wharves at Chatham, Woolwich, Deptford and Portsmouth, until any of them shall fall into such decay as they must be new built.

6. Item.—To continue all her Majesty's navy in serviceable order, and every year to do such reparations as shall be needful, either in making of a new ship, repairing in dry dock, or any way otherwise that shall be needful, so that the full number be kept as they are now at this present. If any ship be decayed, another to be put new in her place, of like length and breadth, sufficiently builded.

[None at all were made new by him.]²

7. Item.—To ground the ships upon all occasions of sea-service, leaks or other needful causes.

8. Item.—All the boats, cocks,³ pinnaces and lighters shall be kept in serviceable order; and as the old do decay, new to be made in their places.

9. Item.—He shall find Norway masts for all the small ships under the Aid;⁴ and the topmasts and topsail yards of all the ships.

10. Item.—That at All-Hallowtide every year

⁴ That is, of less than 250 tons.

there shall be presented unto the Lord Treasurer, the Lord Chamberlain, Mr. Secretary and Sir Walter Mildmay, the names of twenty skilful men—as captains, owners, shipwrights, and masters—of which number the foresaid commissioners shall appoint such a number as they will to make report of the estate of the navy, and to show their opinion what shall be needful to be done to the navy the year following, which shall be likewise performed.

Conditions in the behalf of John Hawkyns.

1. First.—The said John Hawkyns shall have paid him for the service to be done of the other side, the old ordinary warrant of 5,714*l.* 2*s.* 2*d.* monthly as it was, in Anno 1578.

2. Item.—He shall be holpen with the commission, as in Anno 1578.

3. Item.—It shall be lawful for him to entertain as many shipwrights as he will, and as few as he will, and at all seasons and times as the service shall require, and no more.

4. Item.—If any of the ships shall come to a mischance—as God forbid—either by fire, wreck, spoil in war, or such like; or the boats, cocks, or pinnaces; then the said John Hawkyns shall have allowance for the supply of such ships, boats and pinnaces, as the charge shall require, and be judged by the commissioners or officers of the navy.

5. Item.—That if the whole navy shall go to the seas, or a great part of them, whatsoever provisions of timber, board and plank, shall be taken into them for sea service, the said John Hawkyns shall not be charged with above the value of 40*s.* in such stuff for every ship; to say boards, planks, fishes¹ for masts, spare masts for topmasts, and such like.

6. Item.—The said John Hawkyns shall have the assistance of the shipkeepers for the help of grounding of the ships, loading and unloading of provisions, and such like; the use of the hoy for carriage, launching-tackles and crane-ropes &c., as hath been in time past.

7. Item.—He shall also have the use of the wharves, storehouses, forges, and lodgings at Chatham, Deptford, Woolwich, and Portsmouth, for those ministers that shall be needful to attend this service, and for the laying of all manner of provisions readily for the said service.

8. Item.—That if the ships shall ride in any other place by her Majesty's order, then, by the discretion of the commissioners, it may be judged what shall be increased for the same mooring, calling unto them the officers and masters of the navy.

9. Item.—That when a new ship shall be made and ready to be launched, the said John Hawkyns shall make his commodity¹ of the old.

10. Item.—If any ambiguity or doubt shall happen of either part that ought to be considered in equity and conscience be omitted in this bargain, and that the same cannot be agreed² upon amongst the officers, that then the commissioners aforesaid shall, by their discretions, moderate the doubt and order the same.

January 22.—REPORT BY PETT AND BAKER.

[ccviii. 18.—Endorsed, in Burghley's hand : An opinion of Peter Pett¹ and Matthew Baker² the shipwright upon certain articles of Mr. J. Hawkins. Torn and frayed away at the edges.]

The examination of the bargain of Mr. John Hawkins, how far it is performed and accomplished.

First, to the behalf of her Majesty ; the condition divided into [ten several articles] in the first page.

1. First.—All that which was ordinary at such time as it was 5,714*l.* yearly &c.

In this article is to be noted how this 5,714*l.* yearly was employed ; as first the ordinary of the carpentry was undertaken by the master shipwrights for 1,000*l.* per annum ; the moorings by Mr. Hawkins for 1,200*l.* per annum ; the shipkeepers' wages, clerks &c. for 1,814*l.* per annum ; so was spared and remained to her Majesty's farther uses 1,700*l.* yearly ; which whole warrant is continued in Mr. Hawkins' hands to this day. It is said that he employed this 1,700*l.* yearly during 6 years in provision of cordage, canvas, anchors &c., to furnish the storehouse with a double furniture, to be in readiness for all suddens. How the same is performed there resteth a question. And touching the 1,000*l.* a year undertaken by the shipwrights, Mr. Hawkins is to perform the conditions, for that he took from them the benefit thereof from the first day they entered, and they are to abide his reward. After the time of 6 years to this time, being two years and a half, Mr. Hawkyns undertook for that 1,700*l.* [a year] to discharge her Majesty of all extraordinary reparations, new building of ships, as shall come to be said more in place following.

² Son of James Baker, master shipwright under Henry VIII., and himself master shipwright early in the reign of Elizabeth. He is described by John Davys in the dedication to his Seaman's Secrets as one who, 'for his skill and surpassing grounded knowledge for the building of ships advantageable to all purpose, hath not in any nation his equal.'

2. Item.—To pay and continue the number of shipkeepers &c.

Touching this article, the condition may be observed so long as the number of the ships are continued and remain in harbour. But being of late often and long time at the seas, so are the number decreased and the charge greatly eased.

3. Item.—To keep in repair all her Majesty's ships so as upon a grounding &c.

This article was much better observed before Mr. Hawkyns undertook the extraordinary than now it is; for before, the master shipwrights did direct, but now they are to be directed; and being but hirelings were glad to please their master, feeding his humour so long as they doubted to hazard all and reap both shame and dishonesty; for such ships as had been tried at the seas and their weak state discovered, to remedy the same the shipwrights could not be suffered; but that which was done was drawn by force and reported to be more than needed, and besides the shipwrights restrained from grounding of divers ships, which notwithstanding was done [by] force, without order from Mr. Hawkyns. Nevertheless, five of the greater ships are departed from Chatham very foul and not grounded, which is both dangerous, and great hindrance to their working and sailing. How this condition is performed may easily be judged.

4. Item.—To moor the navy sufficiently, so as the ships may ride without danger &c.

Touching this article, as the ships hath not been damaged one way by want [of] good moorings, so hath they been in dangerous state by reason of ill oakum,¹ [which] heretofore was had out of the old moorings that now is made into ropes [again] to a great gain, whereby no oakum is to be had but at the hands of such as [make] it of rotten ropes so that the good hemp oakum that was accustomed to be used [is] banished.

[The best ocom is called pocket-ocom.]²

5. Item.—To repair all manner storehouses, wharves &c.

Concerning these reparations, they are easily maintained, being lately new builded [at] her Majesty's charge.

6. Item.—To continue all her Majesty's navy in serviceable order &c.

Touching this article something is said in the third ; but concerning any one new ship builded at Mr. Hawkyne's charges, it is unknown ; though there hath been a nomination of 3 or 4 to be new builded ere this time ; and the Elizabeth Jonas³ as this year ; but divers were repaired in dry docks, as shall be noted in the sequel hereof ; but the greatest part was done at her Majesty's charge, so that Mr. Hawkyne kept himself within the compass of his 1,700 a year. And the greatest and [chargeable] building now being at hand, good time it is to revoke. And for the continuing of [the number of] ships, he hath put away one old ship and put another in her place. [Whether this be] answerable to the condition or no, let it be judged.

7. Item.—To ground the ships upon all occasions &c.

³ To be rebuilt must be meant. She was thirty years old.

Touching this article it hath relation to the third.

8. Item.—That all the boats, cocks, pinnaces and lighters, shall be kept &c.

Concerning boats, cocks, and pinnaces, there hath been a late supply of divers and many new ones to answer such as were decayed and wanting. At whose charge the same is, may easily be known.

9. Item.—He shall find Norway masts for all the small ships, &c.

What masts hath been found at his charge is uncertain; but well known it is that there hath been above 20 thrust in among the Queen's Majesty's masts at Chatham, of Norway trees, and an entry made of 200*l.* for the same, at her Majesty's charge.

10. Item.—At All-Hallowtide every year there shall be presented unto the Lord Treasurer &c.

Touching this article, the condition is not observed, unless it may have relation to the two master shipwrights' late survey, which is far more favourable than otherwise it would have been, being laid open to so many; which, if it had so come to pass, many do doubt that divers of the ships now upon the way to sea should have tarried behind.

The conditions tending to the behalf of Mr. John Hawkyms, divided into 10 several articles.

First.—The said John Hawkyms shall have paid him for the services &c.

Touching this article, if Mr. Hawkyms had performed his bargain and contented himself with a reasonable gain, then the warrant of 5,714*l.* 2*s.* had been well bestowed. But having a further allowance not less than a 1,000*l.* a year, as his fellows the officers affirm, and yet thinketh all too much that is done, saying the ships are in good state and order for these 7 years, and their state known to the contrary,—who can say in truth this money well bestowed, the condition on the other side not performed?

2. Item.—He shall be holpen with the commission as in Anno 1578 &c.

This commission hath been very beneficial unto him, not only in furnishing her Majesty's yard with planks, timber, boards &c.; but also one other yard in Deptford, which he reapeth benefit as a partner; which yard hath and doth consume more than her Majesty's yard hath done within 2 years, in serving the subject; which breedeth ill speeches in the country, and may hinder the service to come. Besides let it be examined how he exacteth of her Majesty in the prices of such stuff as is proper to the service, either at Deptford or Chatham. Let it be at this instant viewed at Chatham, and truly reported what stuff there is which is taken account of for the charges of this quarter to come. All shells and imperfect timber is vented¹ there. The shipwrights must use it, but cannot remedy it; so it will continue in disorder still in making an officer a purveyor.

3. Item.—It shall be lawful for him to entertain as many shipwrights as he will &c.

In this condition he spared himself and charged her Majesty. For upon the late setting forth the ships, when the Lord Admiral would have the workmen augmented, he said there were too many, and more than could be well occupied. And such other as he kept in ordinary, divers of them he promised much and performed nothing.

4. Item.—If any of the ships come to mischance, as God forbid &c.

This condition her Majesty hath accomplished

to the uttermost. In the Revenge, which ship, by beating upon the ground at Portsmouth, had some decayed place in her keel, which was perfected for a matter of 40, but he had a recompense of 70; the rest was easily borne. As for boats, cocks, and pinnaces, it is to be thought a sufficient allowance is given for such as are lost.

5. Item.—If the whole navy should go to the seas, or a great part of them &c.

In this article Mr. Hawkyns is not charged at the setting forth of the ships for [all¹] sea store above 40s. The rest is borne by her Majesty. But who hath the dividing [the sea¹] store, the examining of the quantity, the manner of the stuff, and the rates of the [same¹]? Most times his partner or his man. The master shipwrights may look upon them and [open¹] their eyes, but cannot remedy it; but it will be seen and easily perceived when the d[ividing¹] is made.

6. Item.—The said John Hawkyns shall have the assistance of shipkeepers &c.

This condition is not denied him, though it be with grief of poor men, which he at the first did gratify, and giveth nothing now.

7. Item.—He shall have the use of the wharves, storehouses &c.

Although the use of her Majesty's wharves, yards, storehouses were proper and incident to his bargain, so, that being void, they are at liberty for any service to come, and no condition broken.

8. Item.—If the ships shall ride in any other place &c.

If he shall require a recompense of a small matter in his moorings, he may consider what hath been spared by those ships that hath been abroad at the seas and spent nothing ; besides the yearly gain gotten by the moorings, not so little as 500*l.* a year, all pensions and charges paid.

[B.M. Harl. MS. 6994, f. 112.—Holograph. Addressed.]

My honourable and good Lord :—I have received your Lordship's favourable letter, and am much bound unto your Lordship for your Lordship's favours. I would to God your Lordship's health and strength were answerable to your mind ; then I am sure this company here with me should be happy to see your Lordship here.

My Lord, on Wednesday last I went to Harwich to see the town and the haven, which I had not seen this 27 years. My Lord, it is a place to be made much of, for the haven hath not his fellow in all respects not in this realm, and specially as long as we have such enemies so near us as they be in the Low Countries, and not more assured than we are of Scotland. My Lord, we can bring all the ships that her Majesty hath, aground there in 3 springs. I know not that we can do so in any place else but here at Chatham. That which is a-doing above the town will be to very good purpose for any sudden [attack¹], and for my part I wish it were as strong as Flushing.

I received a letter from my Lord Cobham, of an enterprise that is sent down to burn all such ships of her Majesty's as shall ride before the Rammekens or thereabouts. I received this letter as I was half the way coming homewards from Harwich. I presently sent away a pinnace, with John Wynter in her, your Lordship's servant, and did send the advertisement unto Sir William Russell,² with a letter of my own; and likewise I did write unto the captains of her Majesty's ships, with certain instructions, which, if the device be attempted, I believe you shall hear they shall smart for their device. There is two ships and a pinnace: their victuals cometh out about an eight days hence, so that then they will come away. In the meantime, if nothing be done already, I doubt not but they shall safely come away. My good Lord, God send you ever well to do: and so I bid your Lordship most heartily farewell. From aboard the Bear, the 23rd of January, 1587.

² Fourth son of Francis, Earl of Bedford, the godfather of Sir Francis Drake. At this time Governor of Flushing ; Lord Deputy

Your Lordship's most assured always to command,
C. HOWARD.

January 24.—HOWARD TO WALSYNGHAM.

[ccviii. 22.—Holograph. Addressed.]

Sir:—I most humbly thank you for your letters. I cannot tell what to think of my brother Stafford's¹ advertisement; for if it be true that the King of Spain's forces be dissolved, I would not wish the Queen's Majesty to be at this charges that she is at; but if it be but a device, knowing that a little thing maketh us too careless, then I know not what may come of it. But this I am sure of; if her Majesty would have spent but a 1,000 crowns to have had some intelligence, it would have saved her twenty times as much. Assure yourself he² knoweth what we do here; and if the army be or do dissolve, it is the preparation that her Majesty of Ireland in 1594; raised to the peerage in 1603, as Baron Russell of Thornhaugh, in Northampton; died in 1613.

hath made that is the cause ; for he cannot abide this heat¹ that is provided for him. He did never think that we would thus have provided for his coming, but that the number of false alarums that he hath given her Majesty would have made her to have taken no alarum, and so to have had the vantage ; and the chopping² up of his friends here I am sure he doth not like ; and if they be up, I wish they should continue so till there be a good peace, which I pray to God to send us.

Sir, if your next advertisements do assure the dissolving of the army in Spain, then it were good we did so here ; yet if the Duke of Parma continue his, and that there be any doubt of anything intended for Scotland, put but three or four more ships to them in the Narrow Seas and I dare assure you it shall beat any power he shall be able to make, and impeach him of any attempt in Scotland ; and I will take upon me the service myself ; for I assure you it doth grieve me to see her Majesty at more charges than is needful, and this charge will not be great. I would fain keep the Narrow Seas three or four months ; I persuade myself I shall do some service.

Upon your next advertisement, as the cause upon that shall require, I will write to you, Sir, my good friend, my opinion, and then you may use it as you shall think best. And so I pray you to write me frankly ; for I do assure you I will take it kindly and friendly at your hands, and think myself much beholden unto you for it ; for I may sometimes, upon a good conceit in my opinion, make such a journey as I did now to Harwich ; and yet it may not be so well taken there ; but I know no cause why it should be but well taken. I do assure you, on my honour, it cost not the Queen's Majesty one halfpenny, nor shall not, when I make any such journey. I will rather spend myself one hundred pounds than to spend her one penny. Thus, good Mr. Secretary I am bold with you, as my special good friend; and so bid you most heartily farewell, and God send you health and strength. From the Bear, the 24th of January.

Your assured loving friend to use,
C. HOWARD.

January 27.—HOWARD TO WALSYNGHAM.

[ccviii. 30.—Signed. Addressed.]

Sir:—I most heartily thank you for your letter and for your advertisements. If it were not for you I should live in a dead place for hearing of anything.

Touching Sir Francis Drake, I have likewise received a letter from him with the like advertisement. There happened a mischance in one of his ships at Portsmouth, that a piece broke and killed a man, with some other hurt. If you would write a word or two unto him to spare his powder, it would do well.¹

Sir, I send you herewith enclosed all the copies of the letters from my Lord Chamberlain again, which I most heartily thank you for, and I pray to God the Scottish King do deceive me, but I am afear'd he will not. For my own part, I have made of the French King, the Scottish King, and the King of Spain, a Trinity that I mean never to trust to be saved by ; and I would others were, in that, of my opinion.

Sir, there was never, since England was England, such a stratagem and mask made to deceive England withal as this is of the treaty of peace. I pray God we have not cause to remember one thing that was made of the Scots by the Englishmen ; that we do not curse for this a long grey beard with a white head, witless, that will make all the world think us heartless. You know whom I mean.¹

I have received a letter from Sir Henry Palmer, that there is at Dunkirk divers hoys and lighters, that be filled with ballast and great stones, surely [means²] for the stopping of some haven. I will have a watch on them.

I pray you, Sir, send me word when you think the Commissioners will be sent over, that I may have all things ready for them ; and I pray you let me know if any go in Sir Amyas Poulet's³ place ; for if he be able to go himself, if I may know of it, I will have especial care of him, that he may go at ease.

² Torn away.

He had himself earned the hatred of the Catholic party by the strictness of his conduct when charged with the custody of the Queen of Scots. At this time he was Chancellor of the Order of the Garter, Governor of Jersey and Guernsey, and one of the commissioners for the treaty. His failing health prevented his going to the Low Countries. He died September 26, 1588, and was buried in London, in the church of St. Martin's-in-the-Field.

Sir, if there be at any time any matter of importance wherein I may do any service there with you, I can be quickly there and here again.

I pray you, Sir, let it be thought on, as you see cause upon your advertisements, it will ask a good time¹ to furnish our fleet again with men as they were. I do not look to see it ever bettered. I pray God it be as well when there shall be cause. And so giving you most hearty thanks for your most friendly dealing with me in all causes, and your friendly remembrance, I bid you most heartily farewell. C. HOWARD.

January 28.—HOWARD TO WALSYNGHAM.

Sir:—I had forgotten in my last letter to answer the matter you did write in touching Captain Morgan, my man. If he had been here I would have sent him unto you; but he is extreme sick at London, and, as I do understand, in some danger; which I am very sorry for, for he is a tall gentleman. He hath the charge of all my soldiers in my ship, and hath done his duty very well. I hope he will answer all honestly and well.

Sir, if the Commissioners be once² gone over and that there be a surcease of arms, it shall be but folly and to no purpose for me to lie here. I think both I and the noblemen, leaving sufficient lieutenants in our ships, and the officers, as Sir W.

Wynter, Mr. Hawkyns and Mr. Borough,¹ remain here with the navy will be sufficient²; for before these ships can have their full number of men again it will be a month to gather them, do what we can. And I pray to God we have them when we shall need; for many are gone abroad, and specially the chiefest men; God send me to see such a company together again when need is. I protest it before God I write not this to you because I am weary with being here; for if it were not for her Majesty's presence I had rather live in the company of these noble ships than in any place. And yet would I be glad that there were something to do. I am more sorrier for the noblemen than any ways for myself; for I would have them save, to spend when need shall be. I do assure you they live here bountifully, and it will be hard finding of such noblemen as these be, so well affected to this service and that will love the sea so well as they do.

Sir, if you think that my continuing here with the navy serve to good purpose, I shall like well of it; but methinks if there be a surcease of arms, then my lying here will make a jest to many, and they have reason. I think it will be a most fittest time to ground our ships in, for now, at our coming out, it was you know on such a sudden as we could not ground but two or three of the middle sort, so as the great ships were not grounded. I have, with the advice of the officers and masters, thought good to begin with some the next spring, and so in a three springs dispatch them all, and have them all in most excellent order by the midst of March, all save the men ; and I doubt not but the ships shall prove some¹ notable liars, and if cause fall out, do a better day of service for England than ever ships did for it yet. But this assure yourself, if the forces of Spain do come before the midst of April, there will be as much ado to have men to furnish us, as ever was ; but men we must have, or else the ships will do no good. God knows it is but a bare sight to see us now to that it was, and I would not wish any to take the pains to come to see us till we are newly supplied, when cause shall be. Sir, God send you well to do and continuance of your health, and so I bid you most heartily farewell. From aboard her Majesty's good ship the Bear, the 28th of January.

Jan. 29.—CONDITIONS OF JAMES QUARLES.

XXIXmo die Januarii 1587.—The humble petition and demand of James Quarles, surveyor of the victuals for her Majesty's navy, if it be her Highness' pleasure that he shall serve by rate :—videlicet—

First, he desireth to be allowed from the first of July last, 7*d.* the man at the seas, and 6½*d.* in harbour, as Mr. Baeshe² then had by virtue of privy seal, and so to continue unto it shall please God to send mitigation of the dearth of victuals that now be, to such reasonable prices as are here under-written ; where it doth appear what they were at such time as Mr. Baeshe did first serve by rate, and so did continue a long time, until late years, and what now they be ; whereby then he was able to serve for $5\frac{1}{2}d.$ in harbour and $6d.$ at the seas, and so will I do most willing her Majesty the like service.

² Edward Baeshe, of an old Gloucestershire family, was Surveyor-General of Victuals for the navy for upwards of forty years. He was twice sheriff of Hertfordshire, and died in April 1587. The fact that he left his widow but poorly provided for seems to speak of an integrity then far from common.

Item, whereas Mr. Baeshe had two thousand pounds to continue with him to amplify his store for all sudden service, I do but desire to have 500*l.* to furnish two thousand men for one month upon 16 days warning.

Item, forasmuch as the store of clapboard ¹ is for the most part wasted, and that it is most necessary that her Majesty should not be unfurnished, to have in readiness to make three thousand tons of cask, I would pray for the speedy performance of the same, to have one thousand pounds delivered unto me, to make provision of the said cask ; which thousand pounds I will repay again into her Majesty's Exchequer at the end of 6 years next following.

Item, I desire that I may have all such her Majesty's brewhouses, bakehouses and storehouses, with the grounds thereunto belonging, in such manner and form as the said Mr. Baeshe had.

February 1.—HOWARD TO WALSYNGHAM

[ccviii. 46.—Signed. Addressed.]

Sir:—I have received your letter, and by the same messenger, a letter from my Lord Treasurer, and my Lord Steward,¹ whereby I perceive the great preparation in Dunkirk for Scotland.

I am advised by their Lordships to have care of it, which I will do to the uttermost of my power. It doth appear no less by your letter but that we may assure ourselves that Scotland is the mark which they shoot at to offend¹ us, and therefore most necessary to provide for that. I have written mine opinion at large in mine answer to that their Lordships' letter, which I know you shall be acquainted with; and therefore, if you do think it reasonable that I have written for her Majesty's service, I pray you let it have your furtherance, knowing that you are so well bent to spend her Majesty's purse, rather than to hazard her honour; and for my own part, had rather be drawn in pieces with wild horses than that they should pass through for Scotland and I lie here.

Sir, thus her Majesty shall see what will come of this abusing peace in hand.

For your advertisements of Spain which should come in April, if we cut off this matter of Scotland, I hope we shall not need to fear the forces in Spain, neither in April nor in May.

Sir, I pray you bear with me that I remember you of this. It doth appear by mine instructions, as also as a matter determined in Council, that the setting forth of this fleet which we have here was for these two purposes:—the one for an invasion from the Duke of Parma upon this part of the realm; the other for going with forces into Scotland. Now what did move her Majesty, or upon what ground, I know not, to diminish our forces here; for if any of both those should happen upon the sudden, we shall be able to do even as much good for the service as the hoys² which lie at Lyon Quay³; for there is no master in England that will undertake, with those men that are now in them, to carry back again the ships to Chatham; and I do warrant you our state is well enough known to them in Flanders, and as we were a terror to them at first coming out, so do they now make but little reckoning of us ; for they know that we are like bears tied to stakes, and they may come as dogs to offend us, and we cannot go to hurt them. But as I would be loth to be any deviser of her Majesty's charge, so do I thank God I was no counsellor of this that is done ; and I hope that if things fall not out according to your expectation and the rest of my Lords, that I may be excused. Yet will I not fail with the uttermost of my power to be ready to impeach any mischief that may be intended.

I have a good company here with me, and so good willers to her Majesty's service, that if the Queen's Majesty will not spare her purse, they will not spare their lives and that which they have. And so I leave; looking every hour to hear from you of more mischief coming by this disputation of peace than any good that ever shall come of it, I bid you most heartily farewell. From off aboard her Majesty's ship the White Bear, this first of February, 1587.

Your most assured and affectionate friend,
C. HOWARD.

February 1.—HAWKYNES TO WALSYNGHAM.

[ccviii. 47.—Signed. Addressed.]

My duty humbly remembered unto your Honour : Having of long time seen the malicious practices of the papists combined generally throughout Christendom to alter the government of this realm and to bring it to papistry, and consequently to servitude, poverty and slavery, I have a good will from time to time to do and set forward something as I could have credit to impeach their purpose. But it hath prevailed little, for that there was never any substantial ground laid to be followed effectually, and therefore it hath taken bad effect, and bred great charge, and we still in worse case and less assurance of quietness.

I do therefore now utter my mind particularly to your Honour how I do conceive some good to be done at last. I do see we are desirous to have peace, as it becometh good christians, which is best for all men ; and I wish it might any way be brought to that pass ; but in my poor judgment the right way is not taken.

If we stand at this point in a mammering¹ and at a stay, we consume, and our Commonwealth doth utterly decay. I shall not need to speak of our estate, for that your Honour knoweth it far better than I do : neither need I to rehearse how dead and uncertain our traffics be ; most men in poverty and discontented, and especially the poorer sort ; our navigation not set on work ; but the French and Scots eat us up, and grow in wealth and freights, and not assured to us in friendship. Our treasure doth consume infinitely with these uncertain wars, and nothing assured to us but new and continual charge. We have to choose either a dishonourable and uncertain peace, or to put on virtuous and valiant minds, to make a way through with such a settled war as may bring forth and command a quiet peace.

This peace which we have in hand hath little likelihood to be good for us, but to win a better time for them. They may easily see how glad we are to embrace peace, and might dissolve their forces without fear of any danger if they meant well. But they do rather increase their forces ; and although they do nothing, yet in keeping us in charge both abroad and at home, they will both shake our store and impoverish the poor commons.

Therefore, in my mind, our profit and best assurance is to seek our peace by a determined and resolute war, which no doubt would be both less charge, more assurance of safety, and would best discern our friends from our foes both abroad and at home, and satisfy the people generally throughout the whole realm.

In the continuance of this war I wish it to be ordered in this sort, that first, we have as little to do in foreign countries as may be but of mere necessity, for that breedeth great charge and no profit at all.

Next, that there be always six principal good ships of her Majesty's upon the coast of Spain, victualled for four months and accompanied with some six small vessels, which shall haunt the coast of Spain and the Islands, and be a sufficient company to distress anything that goeth through the seas. And when these must return, there would be other six good ships, likewise accompanied, to keep the place. So should that seas be never unfurnished; but as one company at the four months end doth return, the other company should be always in the place.

The charge of these companies would not be above 1,800 men in one fleet, which may be 2,700*l.* a month for wages and victuals. And it will be a very bad and an unlucky month that will not bring in treble that charge, for they can see nothing but it is presently their own.

If this may be done with so easy a charge, and recompensed double and treble, why should we stick at it? Some will say, the King will always make a fleet to beat us from the coast. There is no doubt but, with an infinite charge, he may make an army. But it shall be sufficient that this small company shall live daily in their sight and weary them, and gain daily upon them. For an army, as he provideth, cannot continue any long time. His fleet from the Indies and all places can have hard escaping; which if we might once strike, our peace were made with honour, safety and profit.

For these six ships, we shall not break the strength of the navy; for we shall leave a sufficient company always at home to front any violence that can be any way offered unto us. I do herewith send a note how the ships may be fitted, and what they are, and what will be left at home. In open and lawful wars, God will help us, for we defend the chief cause, our religion, God's own cause; for if we would leave our profession and turn to serve Baal (as God forbid, and rather to die a thousand deaths), we might have peace, but not with God. By open wars all the subjects of this realm should know what to do. They would not only be satisfied in conscience, but they would, every man that loveth God, the Queen and his country, contribute, set forward, fight, devise, and do somewhat for the liberty and freedom of this country. By open wars, all the Jesuits and ill affected persons would be discerned and cut off from the hope of their malicious practices. Many things more might be said to the preferring of open war before a dissembled peace, which God doth best allow, and the well affected people of the realm do desire, even to the spending of a great portion of their substance. And therefore I conclude that with God's blessing and a lawful open war, the Lord shall bring us a most honourable and quiet peace, to the glory of his church and to the honour of her . Majesty and this realm of England ; which God for his mercy's sake grant. And so I leave to trouble your Honour. From aboard the Bonaventure, the first of February, 1587.

Your Honour's humbly to command,
JOHN HAWKINS.

Feb. 5.—ESTIMATE OF CHARGE OF SHIPS

[ccviii. 53.]

The 5th of February, 1587.

The charge of the ships with Sir Francis Drake :

The Revenge	250	The Advice	35
Hope	250	Makeshift	35
Nonpareil	250	Twenty - three
Swiftsure	180	other ships
Aid.	120	which have

			1,050
Total 2,900 men

The monthly charge of these 2,900 men is for wages and victuals 4,398*l.* 8*s.* 8*d.*

By the last conclusion before my Lord Treasurer it was agreed that there should be continued in charge only 1,315 men, which is a charge for wages and victuals monthly 1,994*l.* 8*s.* 4*d.*

There is already order given to Mr. Quarles for to victual all the ships under my Lord Admiral's charge and Sir Henry Palmer's to the 14th day of March next.

Now there is a new order to be given to the said Mr. Quarles to victual the ships which are to be wholly under my Lord Admiral's charge, which have in them 2,955¹ men and shall be victualled to the 20th day of April next which is 37 days, to begin the 15th of March next and to end the 20th of April following, both days included, which victualling is a charge of . . . 3,188*l.* 14*s.* 9*d.*¹

The 200 men left in the four great ships may be victualled from time to time upon the ordinary.

Feb. 11.—HOWARD TO SIR F. WALSYNGHAM.

Sir:—I was no sooner come down but I imparted unto my Lord Sheffield that which you had told me, who went presently aboard with no small care to find out his party; and I assure you, with much grief that any such thing should happen in his ship. Himself was to depart to London that afternoon upon very earnest business, which I gave him leave for; but he left such a strait commandment with Mr. Ha. Sheffield, his lieutenant, for the finding out of the truth of this, as he said to him, being his kinsman, if he had care of his honour or well doing, he would take pains in it. And yet my Lord himself, as great haste as he had, made the barber, and three or four more which he suspected, to be sworn; and so they were; and they utterly² renounced the Pope's authority.³

Mr. Sheffield, after my Lord's departure, took great pains and did examine the barber, and found that a two or three years ago, he was something inclined to papistry, but being matched by his wife with a honest race,⁴ as it seems they converted him. I have talked with the man myself. He offers to receive,⁵ and to do anything that a good Protestant should do.

This was the cause I think that bred the doubt in him. He had a book that was done by an English papist beyond the seas ; a bad book ; but he brought it to the preacher, with dislike of the book ; and the preacher is counted to be a most zealous man and very honest. The barber had many good books, as the New Testament, the Book of Common Prayer, the Book of the Psalms which he daily sang with the company. The man was prest by the Company of Surgeons, for he is a barber-surgeon, and not by my Lord ; and he hath sailed often in her Majesty's ships, and accounted a very honest man. I think my Lord Sheffield will send you the party, and I believe you will not mislike him.

Mr. Ha. Sheffield, who is very earnest and zealous in religion, sware unto me that it made him rejoice at the heart to see how earnest my Lord Sheffield was in it, and to hear him use those words he did, which was most vehement¹ against papists, so be-traitoring them, saying he that was in his ship that would not be sworn against the Pope, he would take him for a traitor, and so use him. And this I dare assure you : no man whosoever is readier to communicate than my Lord Sheffield is, which I thank God for.

Sir, Newton,² my man, who came from Dover yesterday, telleth me that one that came from Calais doth report for certainty that the Duke of Guise hath sent down to St. Omers 20 ensigns³ of soldiers, and that they are to come to Dunkirk. If it be true, I think my Lord Cobham⁴ hath certified you. I hope this next spring, which will be on Friday next, if the wind suit us, to go into the Narrow Seas ; but this wind, as it is, locks us in fast enough. sennight, could never since stir, if a realm had been on it. Therefore you may see, in time of service, it is better to be at sea, than locked up in harbour. This wind, a Dunkirker cannot stir out; they are fast locked in as well as we are.

We have had much ado here in changing out of one ship into another¹; but now it is done, victual and all.

If it be true that I do hear there is 900 mariners come to Dunkirk, it may be, whilst the treaty is, they will attempt something to Walcheren; or if it be true of these forces to be come down of the Guiseans,² they will make a short treaty for manners' sake, and presently, upon the breaking up, they will put into Scotland. I hope, with God's goodness, to have a eye to both. But this would I fain know of you, if there be a surcease of arms betwixt her Majesty and the Duke, and not with the States, if in the meantime they attempt anything to the isle of Walcheren, I hope it is not meant but that I should seek to relieve³ it; for I mean to do so, except I have contrary commandment. If there be no surcease of arms, if the Dunkirkers come out, I mean not⁴ to follow them, and if they come out with any number, whereby I may perceive that they carry soldiers with them, although there be a surcease of arms, I mean if I can to stay them, till I know more. Sir, I pray let me have your good advice in this; for whatsoever I shall do it will fall out as it doth continually all things as it is taken.⁴

Sir, I will trouble you no more at this time, but God have you in his keeping, and so I most heartily bid you farewell. The 11th of February.

Feb. 14.—HOWARD TO SIR F. WALSYNGHAM.

[ccviii. 67.—Holograph. Addressed.]

Sir:—I have received your letter with the advertisement from my Lord of Hunsdon,² which I thank you most heartily for, and I am very glad to hear that the King³ doth run so good a course. I pray to God to continue it. And, Sir, if the Queen's Majesty should stick to relieve him⁴ in this

² Henry Carey, born about 1524, created Lord Hunsdon in 1559, was, by his mother, Mary Boleyn, the Queen's first cousin. He had been since 1568 Governor of Berwick and Warden of the East Marches towards Scotland, and since 1583 Lord Chamberlain of the Household. He died in 1596. small matters, she is no good housewife for herself ; for I do not see but this small matter, which my Lord Chamberlain writeth of, if it be supplied, but that it is like and most certain to save her 100 thousands of pounds, besides a great deal of blood of her Majesty's subjects. For I hold it certain if the neck of that be broken in Scotland, it will break all their intent in Spain. But it must be done in time, that it may be known in Spain before they be ready to come out. And this being done by her Majesty, she shall be sure that the King of Spain will never be at that charge he hath been at, upon any Scottish promise.

Sir, where ¹ you write to me that you wish I were at the seas, I do assure you I long for it ; but the weather hath been and is so extreme here, the wind being at East, that we were not able to have our victuals out of the hoys into the ships before yesterday ; and yet all is not in. But as the wind is, it is so in our teeth, as ² if a realm lay on it we could not get out. But assure yourself I will not lose an hour.

I hear for certain that the Duke ³ hath now gotten a great number of mariners together, and his ships full rigged, and victuals and all in, so it is like the next wind that ⁴ is fit for them they will attempt something. Feb. 17.—WM. HAWKYNYS¹ TO J. HAWKYNYS.

[ccviii. 72.—The bill is signed ; the rest in autograph.]

I have received of Anthony Goddard of Plymouth, merchant, the sum of twenty and five pounds of current money of England—I say 25*l*.—which is to be paid him or to the bringer hereof in London, at sight of this bill, by the hands of the right worshipful John Hawkyns Esquire, Treasurer of her Majesty's navy. Dated in Plymouth, the 17th of February, 1587.

Your loving brother,
W^m. HAWKYNYS.

The Hope and Nonpareil are both graved, tallowed and this tide into the road again ; and the Revenge, now aground, I hope she shall likewise go into the road also to-morrow. We have, and do trim one side of every ship by night and the other side by day, so that we end the 3 great ships in 3 days this spring. The ships sit aground so strongly, and are so staunch as if they were made of a whole tree. The doing of it is very chargeable, for that it is done by torchlight and cressets, and in an extreme gale of wind, which consumes pitch, tallow and firs abundantly. I wrote you two days past by Clayton who is gone post. Yesterday I received your letter sent with Sir Francis Drake ; and so I take my

February 21.—WM. BOROUGH TO BURGHLEY.

[ccviii. 77.—Signed. Addressed.]

Right honourable and my very good Lord:—
Inasmuch as I am most deeply bound unto you, well might I be reputed blameworthy if I should not, by all good means that possibly I can, acknowledge the same in dutiful wise, and endeavour to show myself thankful for so great favour and kindness extended towards me in my late distress,¹ even in such sort as you did, both in time and place, when and wheresoever great need required, which I well understand to be far greater than I expected, and even as much as I could in reason desire.
Wherefore, with faithful heart and loving mind, I yield most humble and hearty thanks, confessing myself as much beholden unto your Honour as I am or may be to any man in the world; which I cannot, nor will not be unmindful of, God willing, while breath is in my body. Although I be unable (I would I were not) to make such requital as I earnestly desire, yet nevertheless, I am your Lordship's at command in whatsoever you please, and will be most ready to do you any service I am able or shall be while I live; yea assuredly, I shall not think my life too dear to do your Honour such good as I desire. Unfeignedly I protest it, humbly desiring your Lordship to accept my good will. As touching the great discontent I have received through Sir Francis Drake's injurious, ungodly, and extreme dealings, which are insupportable, though I have suppressed my grief in the respect of the commandment and charge given me, hoping upon redress for the restoring my credit; and that, inasmuch as I was openly defamed, and causelessly condemned in so vile and shameful sort, I should, likewise in public manner, upon due examination of my guiltless cause, have had the innocency thereof made manifest, so as it might have been apparently known how unjustly and injuriously I have been slandered and abused; but yet I find it is not, neither can I conjecture it is like to be; and therefore must be fain to ease my grief as I may, hoping in good time I shall; who desire not of God any longer to live than I shall show myself a faithful and true hearted subject to my sovereign prince and native country, whose welfare and happy maintenance I beseech the ever living Lord long to continue.

Herewith I send your Honour mine answer¹ touching an objection against me for the coming away of the Lion.

Now it may please your good [Lordship²] to be advertised that this day about noon, the Lord Admiral set sail from hence with his fleet, being 8 ships of her Majesty's, viz.—the Ark, the Bonaventure, the Golden Lion, the Vanguard, the Mary Rose, the Dreadnought, the Swallow, and the Foresight, besides the White Lion of my Lord's, and six pinnaces and a ketch. The four great ships remain here at Queenborough, and with them Mr. Hawkyns, myself, and Captain Beeston; which ships we are to bring up to Chatham as soon as we can, and then to ground them and make them ready, as we shall be appointed.

Furthermore, my very good Lord, concerning Mr. Hawkyns' bargain for the navy, Sir Wm. Wynter and I delivered a writing of late to my Lord Admiral, desiring to be resolved therein by his Lordship; who willed us to acquaint your Honour withal. Whereupon I do send you hereinclosed the copy¹ thereof, beseeching your Honour we may understand your Lordship's resolutions touching the same, so as we may be directed by some special warrant. And thus I cease from troubling you, my good Lord, any further, but shall not cease to pray unto Almighty God for your welfare, happiness and bliss; to whose most blessed tuition I commend your Honour, humbly taking my leave. in harbour, for keeping and maintaining all her Majesty's ships and vessels that she then had, there passed an agreement by your Honours with Mr. Hawkyns for the said bargain in form as he had set it down, as himself did shortly after inform us ; and thereupon he proceeded in the execution thereof, and hath ever since continued the same ; till of late, finding the charge far to surmount the demand which by his said bargain he required, in such sort as he was not able to continue it, did therefore (as he hath informed us) signify the same to the Queen's Majesty and your Honours, and became humble suitor that he might leave it at Christmas last, which he hath done, and maketh account from that time forwards the office and charge for the navy is to be ordered and borne as it was in former time, before any bargain was undertaken.

The charge of the office of late hath grown great and very intricate by means of the often rigging, grounding &c., and the number of new ships and vessels added to those that were there when the bargain was spoken of ; by which means we are somewhat troubled in dividing the charge. True it is, that of the said bargain we never saw any warrant in writing from her Majesty, your Lordship, nor from any her Majesty's Privy Council ; neither have we received any such warrant for his leaving the same at Christmas last as he accounteth he hath done. We know that it were hard for him to continue it ; nay, that he is not able to continue it ; yet notwithstanding, it must be left by order ; and therefore we desire your good Lordship, to be directed by special warrant what to do therein, which we will observe as becometh faithful servants to her Majesty.

[ccviii. 78.—Signed. No address nor endorsement.]

My very good Lord:—My son-in-law, Dick Leveson,¹ hath acquainted me how his father is about to make sale of some portion of his living, for the discharge of 2,300*l.* ordered by us presently to be satisfied to a Dane, in respect of his suggested losses; whereunto we were drawn by an opinion we had conceived of Sir Walter Leveson's victualing and furnishing of the ship, that he had taken the goods disorderly. But now, finding, by certain examinations taken in the Admiralty Court, cause to conceive far otherwise than was then determined, and that he is not to be charged but in respect of the discharge of the promise made by Mr. Dr. Cæsar and her Majesty's pleasure; and finding himself unable to pay the same presently without such sale so made before, I am earnestly to pray your Lordship, both on the behalf of Sir Walter Leveson and my son-in-law, whose successive inheritance it doth in like sort concern, to take some such course, as in your Lordship's wisdom shall seem best and most convenient, that her Majesty may discharge the present payment unto the Dane, and that he again, in some reasonable time, may repay the same unto her Majesty, whereby the inheritance may be reserved unto my son-in-law, whose well doing I must needs be careful of. And so hoping of your

My honourable and good Lord :—I have received your letter even as I was weighing to go out ; and for the first part, I am most heartily to give your Lordship thanks for your honourable favour. I will acknowledge it with all my love, and ready to do you any service.

For Mr. Hawkyns' bargain : he is presently to repair to the Court, where he shall be best able to answer in his own defence ; but this much I will say to your Lordship : I have been aboard of every ship that goeth out with me, and in every place where any may creep,¹ and I do thank God that they be in the estate they be in ; and there is never a one of them that knows what a leak means. I have known when an Admiral of England hath gone out, and two ships in fleet could not say so. There is none that goeth out now but I durst go to the Rio de la Plata² in her ; and yet the Mary Rose and the Swallow be with me, who were ships in the King's Majesty's her father's time.³ And therefore I dare presume

And I thank God her Majesty, I hope, may be well assured of their goodness ; yet everything hath his time, and must be helped as need requireth.

My Lord, I had no meaning to carry away all the officers.¹ I have none with me but Sir W. Wynter. I leave Mr. Hawkyns and Mr. Borough behind to wait on your Lordship, and to put the four great ships in readiness, which we shall greatly need if the Spanish forces come out. And so, my Lord, having no more leisure to write at large, being under sail, I bid your Lordship most heartily farewell. The 21st of February, at 12 o'clock the afternoon.

THE PRINCIPAL OFFICERS.*

In the next century these officers, with some additions, e.g. the Surveyor and the Clerk of the Acts, formed the Navy Board, which, under the control of the Board of Admiralty, continued to administer much of the details of the affairs of the navy, until it was abolished by Act of Parliament in 1832.

that the Commissioners did pass away under the charge of Sir Henry Palmer upon Sunday night last past, and as we think, landed the next day following, having a most pleasant passage.

You shall do well to call upon the Lords that it would please their Honours to be mindful that provisions might be made in time to supply the wants which will grow amongst the navy if we make any long continuance abroad, for I dare assure you that which we have and was thought to be sufficient (as it was indeed) at our coming forth, will grow by reason of our too timely coming abroad not to be able without a great supply to serve us out this summer. This winter's weather, although we have been but a while abroad, hath so stretched our sails and tackle, torn many of our blocks, pullies, and sheevers, stretched our boats, and destroyed some of our pinnaces—as the Lion's for one, who is utterly lost and must be furnished of another—as¹ a man would never believe it unless he doth see it; these be the fruits that the seas bring forth, especially in this time of the year, as it is not unknown to you. If you be not careful to call for these things to the Lords, although they are unpleasant suits for her Majesty or them to hear of, you shall not do that that becometh you, nor avoid the peril and danger that may grow thereby; for learn this of me: Lords will be found in no fault if matters come in question.

I trust you do not forget to set forward the masts that should serve for the great ships, although I hope in God we shall not greatly need them.

Our ships doth show themselves like gallants here. I assure you it will do a man's heart good to behold them; and would to God the Prince of

But with sorrow I speak it, I am afraid that they will keep me from the baths of Bath by their long detraction,¹ where I meant to have been to seek health by the beginning of May next.

My Lord Admiral being accompanied with the lords² and other captains, and I also waiting upon his Lordship, not with much ease did land at Dover pier and viewed the same ; where I must tell you I saw nothing that pleased me but only the Pent.³ I had well hoped that it should have been a harbour for good shipping, but now I see it is made a place for passage boats. I do not discommend the harbour for that there will want water ; but I do dislike it in respect that the coming into it is not laid in good soil, which time will discover.

Thanks be to God, my Lord Admiral with all his followers do keep themselves in good health, which I pray God to continue. And thus leaving for this time, I bid you farewell. [ccviii. 87.—Signed. Addressed.]

My very good Lord :—Upon Tuesday, being in the Downs, the wind came to the east, that we were fain to put over to Blackness.¹ This day, being the last of this present, being up amongst the coast towards Calais, I met Sir Henry Palmer, who had wafted over the Commissioners, and afterwards went to Flushing. I have sent your Lordship a packet of letters that he brought from thence. I perceive by a letter that I have received from my Lord Governor of Flushing that the Count Maurice is come to Middelburg ; his errand is, as it is thought, to persuade them of Campvere and Arnemuiden from her Majesty, but by my Lord Governor's letter it doth appear they will stand fast for her Majesty. I also perceive by his letter that Famars² and Villiers have besieged Colonel Sonoy,³ and that

When the Earl of Leicester returned to England in December 1587, though without formally resigning the authority which the States General had conferred on him, Prince Maurice of Nassau was elected Stadtholder and Captain General of the States' army. On this, Sonoy, who commanded in North Holland, declaring himself bound by his oath of obedience to Leicester, refused to acknowledge Maurice, and shut himself up in Medemblik, where he was promptly besieged by Maurice's troops, under Marshal Villiers: it does not appear that Famars was with him. About the middle of March 1588 Sonoy received tardy orders from Queen Elizabeth to surrender the fortress and submit himself to the Prince, which he did. He was deprived of his command, and shortly afterwards took refuge in England, where the Queen allotted him a congenial piece of fenland in Lincolnshire. Owing to his ignorance of English, and perhaps also to his impracticable temper, his attempt to drain it proved a failure. He returned to his own country and settled in East Friesland, on a small pension from the States. Afterwards he

if he have not some comfort, it will go hard with him. I do wonder I have not heard some answer touching my letter which I sent by Kirkman; but the case being as it is, I mean the first wind that shall serve, to send two ships thither¹; for I had rather adventure to send, than the gentleman that is so well devoted to her Majesty should therefore perish. I have his man aboard with me, and hath been these four days; and if the wind had served anything these two days, I had sent him and two of her Majesty's ships to his master.

The first wind that doth serve I do mean to put with² Flushing, and I hope thereby to encourage her Majesty's good friends of Campvere and Arnemuiden and to discourage Count Maurice and his followers. I perceive by Sir Henry Palmer that my coming thither will do good many ways, and I think our being here amongst the coast hath done much good.

There are two French ships that are come out of Spain, that doth report wonders of the Spanish army, and that upon pain of death every man must be ready to cut sail the 25th of March, and that their coming is for England, and that they bring some galleys with them hauled³ at ships' sterns. If this be true, it is sure for the Isle of Wight or Sluys.⁴ If I may have the four great ships come to me in time, and 20 good hoys, but with⁵ 20 men apiece, which is but a small charge, and each of them but with two iron pieces, I doubt not but to make her Majesty a good account of anything that shall be

If the Commissioners bring peace it is the happiest thing that can be; but if they come without it, look for great matters to ensue presently upon it; for the charge is so great that the King is at, both in Spain and here, in the Low Countries, that it cannot continue long, if he had five times the treasure he hath.

Rowland Yorke¹ is dead of the small-pox. I would Stanley² were with him.

The Dunkirkers dare not stir abroad. Sir Henry Palmer this day did rescue a man of Dort³ from them, which they had taken, and one of the Dunkirkers ran into Dunkirk and the other two into Calais; he that went into Dunkirk had his errand⁴ with him to his smart. If we keep them in thus, they will starve.

I protest before God, and as my soul shall answer for it, that I think there were never in any place in the world worthier ships than these are, for so many. And as few as we are, if the King of Spain's forces be not hundreds, we will make good sport with them. And I pray you tell her Majesty from me that her money was well given for the Ark Raleigh,⁵ for I think her the odd ship in the world for

My most humble duty unto your Honour remembered :—This day there arrived from Ostend one of the barks of this town that transported the Earl of Derby's stuff. The master and owners of the bark is William and Henry Tydyeman.³ In their coming from Dunkirk, a man of war of Dunkirk, of the burden of three score tons, with 60 men in her, very well appointed, boarded them and have rifled⁴ and spoiled them of all the money they had ; and that one Thomas Baker of Folkestone and one Thomas Hurleston of Sandwich, who went over for pilots.⁵ That which is taken from them in money and other furniture and apparel is worth 30*l.* ; and they have carried William Tydyeman unto Dunkirk, and the passport of the Earl of Derby. March 3.—HAWKYNS TO BURGHELEY.

[ccix. 5.—Holograph. Addressed.]

My bounden duty humbly remembered unto your good Lordship :—I have been very ill since I was with your Lordship, but now better I thank God.

I do daily hear good report of the good estate of the ships abroad, as it may appear to your Lordship by the letters I send herewith enclosed ; so do I hear many of good judgment that have served now in them report, wondering how these lewd bruits³ could have been cast abroad, and the ships in that sufficient and strong estate. But not to be troublesome to your Lordship, when the shipwrights saw I took a course to put the navy in such order as there should be no great cause to use any extraordinary reparations upon them, then they saw the multitude of their idle followers should lack their maintenance, and so began to bruit⁴ out weakness in the state of the ships ; but they knew not where ; and then every man tare¹ up that which was sufficient, and said this² we will weary Hawkyngs of his bargain. And as this shall be a thing most manifest to your Lordship and the whole world, that the navy is in good and strong estate, contrary to their hypocritical practice and vile reports, so your Lordship shall find the rest of their informations much like unto this.

I would to God her Majesty were so well provided of all furniture that belongeth to the ships as her Highness is of good carcasses of ships, which indeed is the least matter I fear. But the provisions³ that come from foreign countries, and such as require long time to provide, do most trouble me—as great cables, anchors, cordage, canvas, great masts, and such like ; waste and spoil of boats and pinnaces by this winter weather, as Sir William Wynter doth well note.

I am now about to gather together the great issuing that hath been this year of anno 1587 of cordage, canvas, and other provisions out of her Majesty's store, which I think will be 12,000 or 13,000 pound, which must be cared for and supplied in time, without the which the ships cannot serve. There hath been great service abroad these two years past, and the ships mightily supplied from time to time with many provisions, and now call daily in such sort as I am both afraid and sorry to present it to your Lordship. Howbeit, it must be done and care had to do it in time. The expenses extraordinary have been great, and such as before this time hath seldom come in use ; for the navy is great, and men more unruly and more chargeable than in time past, so as it doth not only amaze me to answer everything, but I do grieve at the charge as much as it were to proceed from myself.

I have been careful to replenish the store, for I found it not worth 5,000*l.*; and now I think with this year's issuing, it is worth 16,000 pound. So likewise the ships I found in weak estate, and now they are as your Lordship doth see; and this is done in effect upon the sparing out of the ordinary warrant of 5,719*l.*, yet I am daily backbited and slandered. But your Lordship doth know what a place this is to hold, that I am in. Many are to receive out of this office, and among a multitude, there are some bad and unreasonable; and although I endeavour myself to pay and satisfy all men with order and equity, yet some be displeased.

The matters in the office are great and infinite. My men are sick and dispersed. The trust I am forced to commit abroad and at home is very much; and with great difficulty I keep things in that order as¹ I can give reason for the things that are paid; and many losses I receive by negligence of servants, by such as I put in trust, and by prests² which be without number.

Therefore, my good Lord, consider in your wisdom the burden I bear. My service to her Majesty I grudge not, but all my ability and life is ready to be employed in her service. When it shall be your Lordship's pleasure, I will give mine attendance to inform your Lordship substantially what is to be done touching the provisions that are to be provided for the navy, and the debt that the office

Captain Coxe¹ came from the coast of Spain within five days before the date hereof, in a pinnace of Sir William Wynter's. [He reporteth²] the like number of ships, or little different ; as also of a great number of flyboats that keepeth the coast of Spain, thereby their provisions coming in fleets together to Lisbon in safety. Their intents are known unto your Honour. I would to God we had been now upon that coast ; the impediments would have been great unto their army gathering together, more than I dare presume to write, in my poor opinion. We rest here, a great number of valiant men, and to great charge unto my gracious mistress, and a great grief of mind to spend her Majesty's treasure and do nothing upon the enemy.

I fear when we shall be hastened to go, our provision of victual needful will not be ready in a month ; in which time it will be no small matter, the waste in doing of nothing. If there were three months' provision ready for the proportion of 3,000 men, it would not amount unto above 9,000*l.* ; and if there should need no use of it, there would not be 1,000*l.* lost by it ; and the contrary, the time of stay before it be ready, if cause move the proceedings, ¹ Cf. ante, p. 11. In 1576 William Coxe of Limehouse commanded the Bear in a voyage to the Spanish Main under Captain Andrew Barker, who, after quarrelling with his master and other officers, was put on shore by Coxe in the Bay of Honduras, and there killed by the Spaniards. The Bear was afterwards lost, with the greater part of her men ; but Coxe and eight others escaped, and, after much suffering, arrived in England only to be accused of the murder of Barker, and condemned to a term of imprisonment. How long Coxe remained in prison does not appear ; but in 1583 he was master of the Golden Hind of 40 tons, Edward Hayes captain and owner, in the tragic voyage of Sir Humphrey Gylberte to Newfoundland (see Lediard, 163, 197). In 1588 he proved himself a good navigator and bold man, and was slain, probably — as has been said — in the great fight off Gravelines.

God grant it to his good pleasure, and send your Honour your heart's desire ; craving pardon of your Honour for my boldness herein, not doubting your taking in good part the rude lines that cometh from a soldier. OPINION OF SIR FRANCIS DRAKE.

Mine opinion touching those notes delivered by Captain Coxe.

1. First these flyboats are those which were reported to have the carrying of those pilots from Dunkirk which were provided by the Prince of Parma for this fleet now prepared at Lisbon and now employed by the Cardinal¹ and Marquis of Santa Cruz, as men of war upon that coast, until the fleet be ready, that thereby their passage for all manner of victuals and other provisions may be the safer, as also that there shall be no certain advertisements from thence, and in what readiness their fleet is for what their pretence² is.

2. It is the likelier, for that the said Captain Coxe likewise affirmeth that both French and Dutch men have vowed unto him that they are sworn, before they depart Spain, that they shall not strike sail to any English man of war ; and if they be not able to make resistance, then to throw all their letters whatsoever overboard.

3. He also thinketh that there are by the least 30 sail of those flyboats, men of war, which he hath at sundry times seen ; and that the said flyboats have in every one of them some Spaniards, for that they are all full of small shot.¹

4. He farther reporteth that the Rochellers told him at his first coming upon that coast that there were flyboats men of war, and that they durst not abide upon that coast for fear of them. And farther he himself confesseth that, upon consultation had with his company, they were contented to come away for their better safety, which otherwise they had not done, for that they had good store of victuals left.

5. In my poor opinion it were not amiss that the Lords did think of the continual going to the seas of the smaller sort of our shipping daily upon letters of reprisal, which can do little good ; for that all men of war which come home report that there is no shipping to be seen upon the coast of Spain but such as bring victuals and other provisions in great fleets for Lisbon, and they are waisted with ² men of war ; but ³ those Flemish flyboats, which go in fleets, by the least five, seven and nine in company, which will not leave one English man of war untaken upon that coast, and I doubt lest some are taken already.

6. At this instant there arrived a bark of this town from Bordeaux, who reported that the King of

March 6.—JOHN HAWKYNS TO BURGHLEY.

I have herewith brought unto your Lordship a brief note of the material things that hath issued this last year by warrant of the officers out of her Majesty's store ; and as I can overcome it, your Lordship shall see it more particularly, as we have been accustomed in all our demands yearly for the supplying of the same.

There is already taken into the storehouse and provided to the value of 5,000*l.*, which is unpaid for ; and order given for great cables to be made this winter in Muscovia, for the value of 3,000*l.*, which will be most needful. If your Lordship do give order for the one half¹ of this demand to be paid, the credit of the office may be satisfied ; and so, with some time and leisure the rest may be paid, as your Lordship shall from the office have information, as the necessity requireth, and not before.

For² the great masts is a matter of importance, and requireth some speedy order to be taken in it, your Lordship may speak with Mr. Allin³ in it, which ¹ doth know how they may best be had and with the most speed ; and for that purpose there would be some prest delivered as the necessity shall from time to time require. I will attend upon your Lordship to know what order your Lordship shall think meet to be taken herein, and to satisfy your Lordship of any doubt that may be had in these matters ; and so leave to trouble your good Lordship. The 6th day of March, 1587.

Your honourable Lordship's humbly to command,
JOHN HAWKYNs.

March 9.—HOWARD TO BURGHELY.

[ccix. 9.—Signed. Addressed.]

My very good Lord :—On Friday, being the first of March, riding under Blackness² on the coast of France, the wind came out of west, so as we did put off to have borne over to the coast of England ; and being half seas over, the wind came to the West-South-West and a very hard gale, so as we were driven to put over either for Yarmouth or Flushing. And because Yarmouth was so much to the northwards, we rather chose Flushing. So on Sunday about 12 of the clock in the forenoon, we came in with much wind and passed by the town to the Rammekens. The Elizabeth Bonaventure in coming in, by the fault of the pilot, came aground on a sand where there had been a hulk cast away but a month before, having in her one of the best pilots in the town. I must commend my Lord H. Seymour wonderfully for his honourable mind ; for although many of the ship went out to save themselves for fear, he would by no means stir out of her, but said he would abide her fortune, and so encouraged them all. I and Sir Wm. Wynter came presently aboard of her, where we found my Lord Harry sparing no labour for her help. Myself and Sir Wm. Wynter remained still in her and devised all helps that might be; but that tide could do no good. The next tide, by the goodness of God and great labour, we brought her off, and in all this time there never came a spoonful of water into her well. My Lord, except a ship had been made of iron, it were to be thought impossible to do as she hath done; and it may be well and truly said there never was nor is in the world a stronger ship than she is, and there is no more to be perceived or known any ways of her being aground than if she were new made. She is 27 years old; she was with Sir Francis Drake two voyages¹; and there hath been no voyage which hath been, but she hath been one. Your Lordship shall find it so in your books. And this is one of the ships which they would have come into a dry dock, now before she came out. My Lord, I have no doubt but some ships which have been ill reported of will deceive them as this ship doth. And for that which Sir Wm. Wynter and I have seen now, we will take upon us that the good ship the Elizabeth Bonaventure shall serve her Majesty these 12 years; and I do not know but that the Triumph, the Elizabeth Jonas, the Bear and the Victory should be in better case than this ship; for they are no elder, nor as yet they never had journey to wring them as this ship hath had. Well, my Lord, they will be found good ships when they come to the seas.

Upon Tuesday my Lord Governor² intreated me and all our company to dinner with him, which we did. There came to me thither all the States of Zealand and Mons. de Valke, their Councillor, who presented from all the islands and towns all service to her Majesty, and by especial speech from the town of Middelburg, that they were all her Majesty's, and that none shall come into the town but such as shall always please her Majesty, and that Campvere nor Arnemuiden shall any ways show their duties more than they will do. I gave them thanks on her Majesty's behalf; and yet I spared not to let them know how in some things they had forgotten their duties.

The Count Maurice being there, as soon as ever we came in went his way to Lillo, where some of his fleet lay, and carried with him all that he had, yet he did send a gentleman of his to me with the most humblest message that ever he sent to any, offering all his service to her Majesty, which way soever I would appoint him. I took occasion upon this offer of his, to write a letter unto him touching Mo. Sonoy, and also sent my brother Hoby¹ with it, with a message concerning it. He wrote unto me again. His letter and also the copy of mine, I have sent to Mr. Secretary, which your Lordship may see. He hath promised to do what he can in it, and said if it were in his own power he would, but he must deal with the States; and so went the next morning into Holland to deal with them. I dealt also with the States of Zealand in it; and privately, with Mo. de Valke. I believe they will deal well in it, for so they have promised him. My Lord Governor and I thought it best to forbear four or five days the sending of any ships thither,¹ to see what they will do. I have the Tramontana and the Charles ready; and shall go to Flushing and do as my Lord Governor shall see cause. My Lord, it is very hard to get a pilot in Flushing that will go thither; for I desired Mo. Sonoy's agent to see what he could do to get two pilots, but I could not hear of any. Upon Wednesday, all the captains and chiefest men of Campvere and Arnemuiden came aboard to me to dinner. I did never see men show more love than these do to her Majesty. The captains give her Majesty most humble thanks for her bountiful goodness to them. They of Campvere invited me to dinner with them; and they of Arnemuiden, to supper. I could not deny them, they were so earnest; but the next morning, it was so foul weather that I was driven to send my excuse. That same day there came to me the two burgomasters of Middelburg and five of the principal men of the town, and invited me to dinner to them on the Sunday, which I could not at that time deny them; but with condition that if the wind should serve me to go out, they would pardon me. My Lord, the preparations which were made were very great; such as, our merchants said, the like was never in that town at any time.

On Friday, when the wind came to serve our turns, I sent my son Leveson² and three or four gentlemen to them, to make my excuse, and also to visit the Princess of Orange.¹ My Lord, all the mariners and seamen of Campvere and Arnemuiden came to the governors and captains and told them that they would all serve under me, and be commanded by none but by me ; and said whensoever I would send for them, they would come from Count Maurice or any, to me. They of Middelburg heard of it, and they did the like. My Lord, this I dare assure her Majesty, at this hour she is no more assured of the isle of Sheppey to be at her devotion any ways, than she is of the whole isle of Walcheren and all the towns. Our merchants find, as they say, a great change ; for they were never so kindly handled as they are now. My Lord, I think we have had aboard our ships, to view and look on them, 5,000 people on a day.

My Lord, in my going to Flushing, I took a vessel of Nieuport, and released him again with money in his purse, and told him that I was not on the seas to offend any of them if they would not give occasion ; and that I hoped, ere it were long, we should be all good friends. I told them they saw whether I was able to starve both them and Dunkirk if I listed ; for I could impeach all victuals coming to them, and not suffer any to stir to fish ; but I had no such meaning, if they gave not first cause.

The Charles, coming from the coast of England, met with a Dunkirker, half seas over, chasing two English barks. The Charles rescued them, and had a good fight together ; but the Charles at length made him run on ground under the town of Dunkirk, for he was surely sped. We will not meddle with them except they come out and seek it, for I would be loth to do anything in this time of treating, that might hinder it ; but yet I must not suffer her Majesty's subjects to be spoiled. We had but one in the Charles which was ill hurt. He is hurt, even like Sir Philip Sidney,¹ above the knee, and the bone all broken ; a very great hurt. I have him aboard mine own ship, and am in hope to recover him.

There came into Flushing on Monday a Dane that came from Lisbon, who doth affirm that the Marquis de Santa Cruz is dead² ; but he saith the preparations go on very great.

My Lord, as I was in writing hereof entering into Margate Road, Sir Henry Palmer came aboard and told me for certainty that there are letters come into Middelburg and to Mo. Sonoy's agent that the siege of Medemblik³ is raised ; which I am persuaded upon the hearing of my coming they did. I [had] forgotten to write unto your Lordship that they of Campvere and of Arnemuiden offered to suffer me to bring into their towns what English companies I would, and what number I listed. In like sort I had forgotten Count Maurice, at his departure out of Middelburg, bade them of the town farewell, and told them that he went out of that town as his father did out of Antwerp. He left behind him neither bed-hanging nor anything else, but carried all away with him.

There is much more than I am able to write. This gentleman, Mr. Browne's relation, who will more at large impart the rest unto your Lordship. And this⁴ I bid your Lordship most heartily well to

March 9 (?)—HOWARD TO BURGHLEY. (?)

[ccix. 10.—Holograph.]

My good Lord :—I thought good to advertise your Lordship of a flyboat and a hoy. The flyboat is of Calais, the hoy of Dort. The flyboat was very lately in Spain. They are laden with a 1,000 quarters of wheat of the best. Their cocket is for Rochelle or Middelburg, neither of both the places any great friends to us. This cocket passed from Mr. Wauton.¹ The Flemings report there is as much to come away to-morrow by the like warrant. If wheat go away in such plumps, the market will rise quickly, and the poor in hard case, after such a year as the last was. I have stayed it till I hear from your Lordship, and as you will let me know your pleasure and it shall be done. My good Lord, it is much that the enemy is relieved withal after this manner. Their great army could not continue, nor their ships be victualled, if it were not by these means. I pray your Lordship let me know your pleasure by this bearer ; and so I bid your Lordship most heartily farewell. Aboard the Ark, thwart of the Naze.²

Your Lordship's assured friend to command,
C. HOWARD.

March 9.—HOWARD TO WALSYNGHAM.

[ccix. 12.—Holograph. Addressed.]

Sir:—As I had made up my other letter,¹ Captain Frobiser doth advertise me that he spake with two ships that came presently from Lisbon, who declared unto him that for certainty the King of Spain's fleet doth part from Lisbon unto the Groyne the 15th of this month, by their account. Sir, there is none that comes from Spain but brings this advertisement; and if it be true, I am afraid it will not be helped when the time serveth. Surely this charge that her Majesty is at is either too much or too little; and the stay that is made of Sir Francis Drake going out I am afraid will breed grave peril.² And if the King of Spain do send forces either into this realm, Ireland or Scotland, the Queen's Majesty shall say the Duke of Parma is treating of a peace, and therefore it is not princely done of his master to do so in the time of treaty. But what is that to the purpose, if we have by that a *casado*³? And if her Majesty cannot show the King's hand, his servant's hand will be but a bad warrant, if they have their wills. Sir, for myself I am determined to end my life in it, and the matter is not great. I protest my greatest care is for her Majesty's honour and surety.

I send you a letter that now as I write I received from a man of mine which affirmeth the like; and so, Sir, I take my leave. From aboard the Ark Raleigh, the 9th of March, at 12 a clock at night.

Your very loving friend,

C. HOWARD.

March 10.—SEYMOUR TO WALSYNGHAM.

[ccix. 13.—Holograph. Addressed.]

Sir :—Being assaulted as well with grief as with joy, I stand doubtful whether of them both I should embrace; either to conceal or to open such accidents as befell unto the Lord Admiral and the rest of his navy; but leaving the same unto your honourable judgment, do proceed accordingly.

The Lord Admiral, being earnestly laboured and solicited by letters from the Lord Governor of Flushing to provoke him to ride there with his navy, the wind being also contrary to all his other harbours, thought good to take the same as it served.

Sunday, being the third of March, his Lordship entered into the harbour of Flushing, where, by great misfortune, the Elizabeth Bonaventure came on ground betwixt 12 and one of the clock in the day time, and could not that tide get off. But by the goodness of God, with the presence of the Lord Admiral, and help of the rest of the captains and masters, the same was recovered at the next tide, which was twelve hours after, to the great admiring of the whole island.

The next day after, being the 5th of this month, his Lordship dined with the Lord Governor, where he was very honourably entertained and feasted. There repaired unto his Lordship during his harbour at Flushing, divers of the States and companies of Middelburg, Arnemuiden, and Campvere, who earnestly desired his Lordship's presence in every of their towns, making great protestation and offers of their sincere love and affection which the whole island bare unto her Majesty, so much the rather (as I gather and find) for that the Lord Admiral brought thither his navy to their great liking, and greater discouragement of the enemy, for presently Count Maurice being at Middelburg, departed suddenly with all his stuff and furniture to Lillo, and was assured by divers soldiers and mariners that if he enterprised anything against the Queen they would leave him and stick and serve her Majesty.

Whereupon the Lord Admiral, well advising himself before that he would attempt anything for the relieving of Monsieur Sonoy, wrote very honourably and wisely to the Count Maurice, desiring and wishing him to desist his action and enterprise ; which if he would conform himself thereunto her Majesty would be very thankful. Otherwise in not regarding the same, her Majesty should be enforced to relieve them whom she knew and took to be her good friends. Hereupon Count Maurice returned answer by letters with Sir Edward Hoby (who was the messenger) altogether excusing himself, and condemning Monsieur de Sonoy, who did very much forget himself towards him and the rest of the States, whereby he was enforced to proceed as he did ; yet meaning (as I think) to advise himself with the rest of the States to make good satisfaction to her Majesty.

Now the eight of this month the wind coming very aptly about at the North-North-East, my Lord Admiral omitted no time to make his return to our English coasts, and thanked be God is well arrived to Margate road.

To conclude : I wish that this honourable ship, being grounded 12 hours upon the sands, had been as long in fight and trial with the Spaniards in good sea-room, where with the help of the Lord Admiral and the rest of his fleet, every one of us (I hope) should have acquitted ourselves in duties both to God, her Majesty and country.

So meaning no further to trouble you, being glad to understand of your good health, desire that my humble commendations may be presented to the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Treasurer and the Lord Steward.

From aboard the Elizabeth Bonaventure, the fortunate ship where Sir Francis Drake received all his good haps, the 10th of March, 1587.

Your assured friend to command,
H. SEYMOUR.

March 10.—HOWARD TO WALSYNGHAM.

[ccix. 15. and I.—Holograph. Addressed.]

Sir:—Mr. Frobiser is now come in to the road here in Margate, who hath passed up and down in the Narrow Seas to see who passed and whither. He met with 4 hulks that came from Rochelle, who told him for certain that the Prince of Condé is dead,¹ and that they saw the mourning for him, and great sorrow in the town for it. Within 5 days after word was brought to the town that the King of Navarre was also in great danger. They were both poisoned much about one time, yet they were not together. It is but 10 days since they parted from Rochelle. I pray God the King be not dead. It is too great a loss of the other, if it had pleased God. I pray God that her Majesty take good care

Yesternight there came one to me of purpose from Dunkirk, who doth assure me that on Wednesday last there came a Scottish gentleman out of Spain to the Duke of Parma, and brought a packet from the King and declared that the Spanish forces by sea are for certain to part² from Lisbon the 20th of this month with the light moon,³ and that the number of the fleet when they all do meet, of great and small, will be 210 sails; and the number of soldiers, besides the mariners, are 36,000. I am sorry Sir F. Drake is not in more readiness than he is. I know the fault is not in him. I pray to God her Majesty do not repent this slack dealings. It had been good he had been ready, though he had but lien⁴ on our coast. I am afraid he will not be ready in time, do what can be done. All that cometh out of Spain must concur in one to lie, or else we shall be stirred very shortly with heave and ho.⁵ I fear me ere it be long her Majesty will be sorry that she hath believed some as much as she hath done, but it will be very late. By all that I can gather it should be Hunter that is come out of Spain. The party saw the Scottish gentleman, and describeth him much like Hunter.

For her Majesty's four great ships, I am out of hope to see them abroad, what need soever shall be. If things fall out as it is most likeliest, they shall be to keep Chatham Church when they should serve the turn abroad. I protest before God, I speak not for myself any ways, but for her Majesty's service and surety; for whensoever they should come, I mean not to change out of her I am in for any ship that ever was made.

Sir, I pray you let me hear from you how the peace is like to go on; for if I may hear in any time that it is not like to come to pass, I will make some provision for the choking of Dunkirk haven, although it serve but for a month; for from thence do I fear most. They look daily at Dunkirk for 1,200 mariners out of France; but if I have knowledge in any time, I hope to stop their coming out, and so the better able to look some other way.

Sir, if her Majesty think that her princely preparation of Sir F. Drake's fleet, and this that I have, should be a hindrance to a peace and that the King of Spain should take it ill, why should not the King of Spain think that her Majesty hath much more cause to think ill of his mighty preparations? It will peradventure be said he hath many ways to employ them, and not to England. That is easily answered, for it is soon known by the victualling; and he never prepares so many soldiers for the Indies. Sir, I will for this time bid you farewell. From Margate road, the 10th of March.

Your assured loving friend,
C. HOWARD.

Sir:—I pray you that there may be order taken for the staying of all shipping in England for a cause that I will write more at large hereafter.

*March 13.—MEMORANDUM AS TO

[ccix. 16.—Rough note in the autograph of Lord Burghley.]

The proportion of victualling to the seas:

Nota 28 days to 1 month; whereof—

Fish days . . . 10	} Whereof 4 Fridays that have but 4 meals; so there wants 2 days. ¹
Flesh days . . . 16

Fish days . . . 20 meals.

Flesh days . . . 32 meals.

The fare of fish days for every man per diem:

Biscuit . . . 1 lb. Beer . . . [1] gallon.

In fish . . . 1 qr. of stockfish, or the 8th part of a ling.

In cheese, per diem, 1 qr. of a pound.

In butter, half qr. per diem.

The flesh day:

Beer and biscuit, ut supra.

Flesh, 2 lbs. salt beef per diem, so as every man hath 1 lb. for a meal, and 4 men have 4 lbs. for a meal.

For one day in the week:

A device for bacon for 1 day in a week.

1 lb. of bacon for a man per diem.

A pint of pease for 1 man for a meal.

1 pottle of pease for 4 men.

4,000 cask will serve for 10,000 men for beer and beef for 3 months.

¹ This was ingenious. On Fridays only half allowance was to be issued, so that the saving on four Fridays amounted to whole rations for two days; and the victuals for twenty-six days served for twenty-eight.

So there will be 3 days in the week—viz. Sunday, Tuesday and Thursday—for beef; and 3 fish days—Wednesday, Friday and Saturday; and Monday, for bacon and pease.

March 12.—SUGGESTIONS FOR REDUCING EXPENDITURE.¹

[ccix. 17.—Noted, in Burghley's hand :—Saving by . . . ² of beef.]

For the saving of her Majesty 2,666*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* by altering the provision of beef into other victuals, the manner whereof ensueth.

Every man's victual of beef standeth her Majesty 4*d.* the day, at 2*d.* the pound, besides cask and salt. And so the mess, being 4 persons, amounteth to 16*d.* the day for their meat, besides bread and drink.

By altering that kind of victual as before, to fish, oil and pease, her Majesty's charge will be but 3*d.* for 3 fishes the day, at 10*s.* the hundred of newland-fish; 2*d.* in oil for the mess the day, and 2*d.* in peasen at 2*s.* the bushel, with one penny upon every mess the day for cask and other charges; which amounteth to in all but unto 8*d.* the day. So do you save the other 8*d.* on every mess the day, which is half the charge that the beef did stand. Which for the 20,000 men aforesaid, according to her Majesty's allowance, did amount unto 5,333*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* The moiety wherof saved is, as before,

¹ This is an early instance of the sort of suggestions that all officials are probably familiar with, as well as newspaper readers during the silly season. It is certainly unjust to attach the discredit of them to either Burghley or the Queen. Mr. Froude has called the writer a 'miserable scoundrel' (History, xii. 369); 'ignorant blockhead' would perhaps be more appropriate; he could not even work his arithmetic correctly. ² Torn away.

March 12.—JOHN HAWKYNS TO BURGHLEY. (?)

[ccix. 18.—Holograph.]

My most honourable and very good Lord :—
Although I doubt not but your Lordship is advertised of the coming over of the navy with my Lord Admiral to Margate, yet I thought good your Lordship should see what my Lord doth write, for that daily they consume and call for that which I did always fear.

The Bonaventure, which was condemned before your Lordship for a decayed ship, doth prove far contrary ; yet I desire not they should come to such trials.

I will take order to send my Lord 200 men with speed, if they be to be had in Thames.

I have already made a new shift of sails for the Rainbow, for they have not been renewed since she was made ; and were at the first single, but now double.

If I had known the purpose that is meant for the two hoys, I could have fitted them thereafter ; but it is like they are to sink in some place, or to beat in shoal water with great ordnance. This will be a matter of some charge, therefore I do acquaint your Lordship with it ; for it may be your Lordship is advertised of the purpose.

I do prepare and am doing for 20 great anchors, which is a very great work and costly. So do we take up canvas and other provisions upon credit, which is not the best way. If the service continue, we shall not be able to supply the want without your Lordship's help.

My Lord doth specially commend the Ark Raleigh, which indeed is the best ordered ship that I have seen for all conditions and purposes, although there be many others most excellent ships.

I would be glad to follow your Lordship's opinion for the hastening of the four great ships, and so in all the rest ; for your Lordship can best discern what is of necessity ; and so praying God long to preserve your Lordship in health, I humbly take my leave. From my house in Mincing Lane, the 12th of March, 1587.

Your honourable Lordship's humbly to command,
JOHN HAWKYNs.

*March 29.—EARL OF SUSSEX TO SIR F.

It may please your Honour :—Whereas I sent forth a boat for discovery, and that the weather grew so stormy and tempestuous that they were not able to continue and abide the seas, but to return with small advertisements, nevertheless I have thought good to send unto your Honour herein enclosed the note of the captain's declaration. I have also sent unto you herein the declaration of the master of a hoy, who came into this harbour yesterday from Newhaven.¹

I have also thought good to advertise your Honour that this morning I have sent a bark, and therein one in whom I repose some trust, to learn news and also to discover what he may. And for that I perceive these actions will not well be brought to pass, without some action by other matters to colour the same, I have put into her fifty quarters of wheat, and have willed him to make two ports, whereof St. Malo, or some port near to the same, to be one, the other as he may, and both to be as wind and weather will serve.

[The rest of the letter refers to other matters, especially the examination of Mr. Richard Cotton of Warblington, described as 'an obstinate recusant.' The letter is signed at 'Portsmouth, the 29th of March, 1588.']

[ccix. 39, I.—Copy. First enclosure in Lord Sussex's letter of March 29.]

Captain Story his note of the voyage made in a small boat for discovery the 10th of March, 1588.

Imprimis, upon Sunday, being the 10th of March, the boat was brought on ground to be trimmed and made ready for the voyage.

Item, on Tuesday at night, she being made ready, we hauled her out into the channel, pretending to have gone the same night to sea; but the wind was easterly.

On Wednesday morning we rowed out of the haven, the wind being easterly; with sail and oars, we gat St. Helen's Road, were we rid with the wind at South-East and could not get out until it was Thursday morning.

On Thursday, we rowed to sea as far as Dunnose, where we descried a fleet of ships to the windward, the wind being easterly, and bare towards them with sail and oars till we fetched up one of them, which was a ship of London come from Rochelle, whom we asked what the other were, and he said they were hulks bound home from Brouage.

News from Rochelle he could tell none, but that the Prince of Condé was dead. Then the wind came to the North-East, and we went over with the coast of France, so near the East as we could lie, thinking we could have fetched to Scine Head, but we could but fetch to the Bay of Hogges,¹ for that wind blew so and that sea went so high, that we could maintain no sail save our main course² very low set.

On Friday morning we saw the land, which was between Barfet-nes³ and the Bay of Hogges, and sailed alongst the shore till we came to Cherbourg.⁴

where we met with two tall ships of Cherbourg bound for Spain, as we think; but we could not speak with them by reason of the foul weather. And from thence we went to Alderney, thinking to have gotten some harbour; but the weather was so extreme foul that we could not. Yet the same night we got to Herm,¹ where we rid Saturday, Sunday and Monday, with very foul weather, not able to look out. Yet I sent over to that castle to know if there were any news, and the soldiers came aboard and told us that there were many great fleet passed by, both of Frenchmen and Flemings, both to the eastward and to the west. Then the weather being fair, we came to sea and met a southerly wind, that blew so sore that we were able to maintain no sail but our main course.²

On Wednesday morning we met with a great fleet of ships betwixt Portland and the Isle of Wight, fifty sail or thereabouts. Five of them gave us chase, and the headmost man of them we bare with him and spake with him and asked of him whence the rest were. He said they were all Dutch ships bound for Brouage. Other news they could tell none. And from them, we came in at Needles and went to speak with the men of war at St. Helen's, and so came in.

a Frenchman told him that the French King was marching towards Normandy and the sea coast ; and other told him that it was against the King of Navarre. And that there was a flyboat of Danske,¹ which came from Cadiz in Spain, who arrived at Newhaven this day sennight, and had been at sea about 18 days, who saith that all the French shipping is stayed in Spain and Portugal, for the service of the King of Spain ; and thinketh that all other ships be stayed, for he himself had been stayed, if he had not stolen away. Also he saith that a Frenchman did swear to him by God that the King of Spain would come, and that they would be ready the 24th of this month ; and the man answered 'Tush, he will not come yet.' 'Yes,' saith he.

2. He also saith that he spake with a man of Marseilles, who did also affirm the same and said that there was in that fleet 24 great galleasses ; and they both affirmed that the whole fleet was between 4 and 500 sail.

3. He also saith that he heard both the Scots and French say that they looked for them of Spain daily ; and that when they came, they would join with them.

There were now, at his being at Newhaven, 56 or 57 sail of Scots there, who were there before his coming, and, as they said, bound for Brouage ; but whether, he could not justly learn ; but they might have gone out at his coming away, if they would ; and therefore, why they tarry, he knoweth not.

He saith the Scots fell out with him and caused him to pay 30 crowns to the church there and other places, by order of the Governor's officers ; and that the Governor would not hear him speak for his answer and trial.

He saith that the Scots said unto him that if they might catch him at sea, they would heave him and his overboard, and all other Englishmen, and would pull their hearts out of their bodies; calling them 'English dogs,' saying they would be revenged of the blood of their queen.

The Governor of Newhaven doth not trust the townsmen there, and is now building of a fort to command the town, and is a very hard man against Englishmen.

He saith that he heard him that came from Marseilles say that Andrew Doria, Prince of Mellita,¹ was come unto Lisbon with a great sort of galleys, and should be admiral of the King of Spain his fleet, and that, as he remembereth, the number of the Spanish army should be 50 thousand.

March 30.—DRAKE TO THE COUNCIL.

[oct. 40.—Signed. Addressed.]

Right honourable and my very good Lords:—
Understanding by your good Lordships' letters her Majesty's good inclination for the speedy sending of these forces here unto the seas for the defence² of the enemy; and that, of her Majesty's great favour and your Lordships' good opinion, you have made choice of me (although the least of many) to be as an actor in so great a cause, I am most humbly to beseech my most gracious Sovereign and your good Lordships to hear my poor opinion with favour, and so to judge of it according to your great wisdoms.

If her Majesty and your Lordships think that the King of Spain meaneth any invasion in England, then doubtless his force is and will be great in Spain; and thereon he will make his groundwork or foundation, whereby the Prince of Parma may have the better entrance, which, in mine own judgment, is most to be feared. But if there may be such a stay or stop made by any means of this fleet in Spain, that they may not come through the seas as conquerors—which, I assure myself, they think to do—then shall the Prince of Parma have such a check thereby as were meet.

To prevent this I think it good that these forces here should be made as strong as to your Honours' wisdoms shall be thought convenient, and that for two special causes:—First, for that they are like to strike the first blow; and secondly, it will put great and good hearts into her Majesty's loving subjects both abroad and at home; for that they will be persuaded in conscience that the Lord of all strength will put into her Majesty and her people courage and boldness not to fear any invasion in her own country, but to seek God's enemies and her Majesty's where they may be found; for the Lord is on our side, whereby we may assure ourselves our numbers are greater than theirs. I must crave pardon of your good Lordships again and again, for my conscience hath caused me to put my pen to the paper; and as God in his goodness hath put my hand to the plough, so in his mercy it will never suffer me to turn back from the truth.

My very good Lords, next under God's mighty protection, the advantage and gain of time and place will be the only and chief means for our good; wherein I most humbly beseech your good Lordships to persevere as you have began, for that with fifty sail of shipping we shall do more good upon their own coast, than a great many more will do here at home ; and the sooner we are gone, the better we shall be able to impeach them.

There is come home, since the sending away of my last messenger, one bark whom I sent out as an espial, who confirmeth those intelligences whereof I have advertised your Lordships by him ; and that divers of those Biscayans are abroad upon that coast wearing English flags, whereof there are made in Lisbon three hundred with the red cross, which is a great presumption, proceeding of the haughtiness and pride of the Spaniard, and not to be tolerated by any true natural English heart.

I have herein enclosed sent this note unto your Lordships, to consider of our proportions in powder, shot and other munitions, under the hand of the surveyor's clerk of the ordnance ; the which proportion in powder and shot for our great ordnance in her Majesty's ships is but for one day and half's service, if it be begun and continued as the service may require ; and but five lasts¹ of powder for 24 sail of the merchant ships, which will scant be sufficient for one day's service as divers occasions may be offered. Good my Lords, I beseech you to consider deeply of this ; for it importeth but the loss of all.

I have stayed this messenger somewhat the longer for the hearing of this Dutchman who came lately out of Lisbon, and hath delivered these advertisements herein enclosed, under his hand the 28th of this March, before myself and divers justices.

I have sent unto your good Lordships the note of such powder and munition as are delivered unto us for this great service ; which, in truth, I judge to be just a third part of that which is needful ; for if we should want it when we shall have most need thereof, it will be too late to send to the Tower for it. I assure your Honours it neither is or shall be spent in vain. And thus resting at your Honours' further directions, I humbly take my leave of your good Lordships. From Plymouth, the 30th of March, 1588.

*April 2.—WM. COURTENAY¹ TO

To the Right Honourable Sir Francis Walsingham, Knight, Principal Secretary to her Majesty.

May it please your Honour to take into her Majesty's service certain hoys of the burden of 120 tons and upward apiece, to the number of 15 or 20; which hoys will carry, to their burden, cannon, demi-cannon, culverin, demi-culverin and saker ; for that the number of mariners will be few ; for the same hoys will not ask above 20 or 25 mariners apiece, and 50 or 60 soldiers in every hoy with the small shot. And these 20 sail of hoys shall not stand her Majesty in so much charges as the setting out of 6 sail of ships ; and 500 mariners will serve the 20 sail of hoys, and 800 will not serve 5 sail of ships ; and these 20 sail of hoys shall do as good and rather better service than 40 sail of ships shall.

Imprimis, 15 or 20 sail of hoys to be set forth with their spar-deck or netting to be made musket free by the sides, from the mast afterward, and with light spardeck or netting overhead for the safeguard of the men.

Item, these 15 or 20 sail of hoys, to be set in order five and five in a rank, and to be half shot one from another, will make as good service for the enemy as 40 sail of ships ; for that if they may have any wind to turn them, they will shoot twice to a ship's once, and the more wind the better they are.

Item, they are good to be set foremost of a fight, that shall happen if the enemy come ; and for the Narrow Seas, your Honour cannot desire better ships than these hoys.

Item, I will not have above 4 or 6 guns in a hoy ; for that 5 or 6 men will serve to stand by her sails, and the rest of her mariners to help the gunners to traverse the ordnance ; and to have the soldiers stand by their small shot.

Item, your Honour cannot have a ship of 100 or 120, but they must have 10, 15 or 20 gunners, and 150 or 200 men in a ship, besides others to help to tackle her about ; which in every hoy 20 mariners will serve for all turns.

Wherefore if any service in her Majesty's affairs be required, if it shall please your Honour to accept of my poor service in these hoys, I will rest at her Majesty's or your Honour's commandment.

Your Honour's most humble at commandment, WILLM. COURTENEY.

April 5.—THE MAYOR AND ALDERMEN OF POOLE TO THE COUNCIL.

Our obedient duties unto your Honours in most humble wise remembered :—Your Honours' letters of the first of this present month of April to us directed, we have received the third of the same ; the contents whereof is that her Majesty doth understand that there are a good number of very apt and serviceable ships and vessels appertaining to this town, and that we should make choice of one serviceable ship of the burden of 60 tons, and one pinnace, to be furnished for two months, to be in a readiness by the 25th day of this present month ; and further importing that some merchants of this town have set forth certain ships in warlike sort, by way of reprisal, whereby they have received no small profit. May it therefore please your Honours to be advertised that there is but one ship in this harbour at this present above the burden of threescore tons ; which ship is called the Primrose of Poole, and is of the burden of 120 tons or thereabouts, being ready rigged and victualled to depart for the New-found-land, having in her two sakers, four minions, one falcon, and two falconets, with shot for the same and 500 pound weight of powder, and eight calivers. And for a pinnace, there is one small bark of this town, of the burden of 30 tons or thereabouts, called the Elephant, able to serve for that purpose, if she had munition and other furniture to set her forth. Both the which we have made stay of until we shall receive further order from your Honours. And for the merchants of this town there is not one that hath set forth any ship by way of reprisal, or otherwise gotten anything that way. Our humble suit and petition unto your good Lordships now is, that it may please the same to consider of the great decay and disability of this poor town, by reason of embargoes, want of traffic, loss at sea, and by pirates, which have and do continually lie at Studland Bay, being the mouth of this harbour, robbing both our poor neighbours and others resorting to this town. And lately having been at great charge in making of necessary provision for the defence of the enemy, whereby we are utterly unable to perform your Lordships' commandment for setting forth of a ship and pinnace, most humbly beseeching your Honours to discharge us of the same, being compelled to set down the truth of our poor estate to our great grief. Wishing that we were as able as willing in all dutiful and obedient services as becometh good and faithful subjects, we most humbly pray for the preservation of your Honours in prosperous estate, long to continue. April 6.—SIR G. CAREY¹ TO WALSYNGHAM.

My duty to your Honour humbly remembered :—
Having received letters from the Lords of her Majesty's Council the fifth of this present, by the which it appeareth that the preparation of the Spanish forces are continued, and thereupon their resistance intended in their honourable wisdoms, by arming a competent number of ships out of the maritime cities and places of good shipping within this realm ; and that it seemeth an advertisement hath been exhibited to her Majesty that there are a good number of very able and serviceable ships appertaining to the merchants and inhabitants of this island ; whereupon their Lordships have thought good to require of the inhabitants of this island the furnishing of a warlike ship and pinnace, fit and able for service, furnished for two months with victuals, mariners, munition and other necessary provisions, by the 25th of this present, to be in readiness to attend the Lord Admiral :

It may please your Honour to understand that —albeit I shall, for mine own part, be most ready, by any service, to testify my dutiful and zealous affection towards her Majesty and my native country, as also the inhabitants of this place are most desirous, by all possible means, to maintain her Majesty's good opinion so graciously conceived of them ; yet for that the island is utterly unprovided of any warlike ships or vessels fit for employment in such services, the greatest thereunto belonging not exceeding the burden of seventy tons, and that the insufficiency and great poverty of the merchants of Newport is such (being rather a poor market than a merchant-like town) as may hardly extend to the furnishing of one quarter of a ship fit in so warlike manner to be set forth—I have thought it fit first to advertise your Honour of the error of that information by the which I conceive the direction of your letters grew of this place,¹ before I would terrify the minds of this country with so great a charge, neither usual nor accustomed, which might breed discontentment and work no effect, seeing they continue the burden of continual charge in their daily preparations for defence of this place.

Wherefore I shall humbly beseech your Honour to acquaint the Lords with the poor state of this country, [and²] the difficulty of effecting their commandment; and if they shall [will that²] we proceed with this preparation, to send me your further direction, whether by way of subsidy, or in what sort this charge intended should be levied; being of opinion that my authority will neither stretch to charge them with a matter of so great innovation, nor that it may be done without the general taxation of the island, which I conceive is not meant, in respect the like is not done by the inland men of the mainland. Besides, out of this place no shipping hath been sent by way of reprisal at any time, saving only by myself; and having sustained more loss than gain thereby, I hope it be not their Honours' pleasure to charge me with what I shall be so hardly able to bear.

And so presuming to crave from your Honour farther direction, in a matter so strange and unapt to be offered to this place, before I shall proceed, I shall rest most ready to perform what may be in my power to accomplish in this and in all other matters, upon your farther honourable directions ; and so humbly commit you to the tuition of the only Almighty. From Carisbrooke Castle, this 6th of April.

Your Honour's most humbly and assured to command,
GEORGE CAREY.

April 7.—HOWARD TO WALSYNGHAM.

[ccix. 74.—Holograph. Addressed.]

Sir :—By your other letter I find her Majesty cannot be brought to have for her surety, to lie near unto her, the 4,000 footmen and the 1,000 horse. I am sorry her Majesty is so careless of this most dangerous time. I fear me much, and with grief I think it, that her Majesty relieth upon a hope that will deceive her and greatly endanger her ; and then will it not be her money nor her jewels that will help ; for as they will do good in time, so will they help nothing for the redeeming of time being lost.

For the setting out of the galley,¹ I think there is no man of judgment but doth think it most meet for her to be abroad now, being summer ; and when should she sail if not at such a time as this is ? Either she is fit now to sail, or fit for the fire, and I will never hereafter wish her Majesty to be at the charge of the keeping of her, for I hope never in my time to see so great cause for her to be used. I dare say her Majesty will look that men should fight for her, and I know they will. At this time the King of Spain doth not keep any ship at home either of his own, or any other, that he can by any means get for money. Well, I pray heartily for a peace, for I see that which should be the ground of an¹ honourable war will never appear; for sparing and war have no affinity together.

Sir, touching the releasing of the Scottish ships and the French,² in my opinion it were not amiss to have them stayed a while; and better to have them stay there, than for me to stay them when they are come out; for I know for certain, there is none of the Scots nor French but they carry in their ships Englishmen and colour them for Scots; but for the Scots that are to go into Scotland, they may be suffered to depart; but for the French, I pray let us stay as well as the King of Spain. He hath stayed all, but with their will; for I am sure a great number of them went of purpose. I am afraid we shall find them all false in France, from the highest.

Sir,³ the great Swede⁴ that is stayed, and hath goodly masts in her, and most fittest for her Majesty, otherwise her Majesty should have been fain this next year to have sent a ship of her own for masts into the East Countries,⁵ which would have been a great charge, I mean as soon as I can, to send her up to Chatham or to Blackwall; but I do assure you the chiefest matter of all is that we keep them from serving the King of Spain's turn. There be many things else in her that will serve well the turn now; but it must be considered how they shall be contented; for I mean not in this time to let any such ship to pass into Spain. She is a very great ship, and well appointed with ordnance;

she hath many things in her, and I believe for certain, much belonging to Spaniards. I would wish when she cometh up, that some order might be taken for her unlading, and then to return to me to serve; and so, for this time, I leave you to the Almighty to bless you with health. April 7.—THE MAYOR AND ALDERMEN OF KINGSTON-UPON-HULL TO THE COUNCIL.

Most Honourable, our most humble duties remembered:—We have received your Lordships' letters by David Jenkyns, her Majesty's pursuivant, dated at Greenwich the first of this instant month, wherein your Honours do require us to make choice of two serviceable and good ships, not to be under the burden of three score tons, and of one pinnace; and to cause the same presently to be put in a readiness and furnished for two months, with victuals, mariners, munition, and other necessary provision and furniture, by the 25th of this present month of April, to join with her Majesty's navy in the seas, or to be otherwise employed as we shall receive further directions from your Honours or from the Lord Admiral of England.

May it therefore please your good Lordships to be advertised that, before the receipt of your Lordships' said letter, all the mariners now in the town any way able to serve, to the number of ninety and four, were and are pressed the sixth of this present month, to serve in her Majesty's navy, by Christopher Chapman, by virtue of a commission under the Great Seal of England, directed to John Hawkyns, dated at Westminster the 2nd of February in the two and twenty year of her Majesty's reign ; and of a deputation from the said John Hawkyns to the said Christopher Chapman, bearing date the first of April, Anno Domini 1588 ; which said mariners were appointed by him to be at Chatham the 20th day of this instant month. And forasmuch as all the best ships meet for service belonging to this port be abroad in the parts beyond the seas and at London, and the town destitute of mariners at this present (as appeareth by a note hereinclosed¹), we are no way able, as most willingly we would, to accomplish your Lordships' appointment in so short time, until God send the ships and mariners (now being abroad) to be comen home. Whereof we have thought it our duties (in most humble manner) to certify your Honours. Nevertheless when it shall please God to send some better store of shipping and men home, we shall, to the uttermost of our powers, show all readiness and willing disposition to the performance thereof, as becometh good and dutiful subjects, upon further direction from your Lordships, and warrant for taking of such ships and men as shall be thought meet, with all other furniture meet for that service. April 8.—HOWARD TO BURGHLEY.

My honourable and very good Lord :—I thought good to put your Lordship in remembrance how necessary it is to have a better proportion of victual than for one month, considering the time and the service that is likely to fall out ; and what danger it might breed if our want of victual should be at the time of service.¹ We shall be now victualled, beginning the 20th of this April, unto the 18th of May, at which time the last month's victual doth end ; and by the advertisements that giveth the largest time for the coming out of the Spanish forces, is the midst of May, being the 15th. Then have we three days' victual. If it be fit to be so, it passeth my reason. I think there is none that will venture to carry these ships to Portsmouth² under a month's victual. My Lord, this would³ be cared for in time ; for whensoever our victual shall come, it will ask 4 or 5 days, the taking in of it ; and the weather may so fall out as in 10 days we shall scanty take it in. I think since ever there were ships in this realm it was never heard of that but a month's victual was prepared for to victual withal. King Harry, her Majesty's father, never made a lesser proportion of supply than 6 weeks⁴ ; and yet there was a marvellous help upon any extremity ; for there was ever provisions at Portsmouth, and also at Dover ; and his baking and brewing there ; so as, for the service then, which was only for France, it was ever at hand upon any necessity.

My good Lord, let me be borne withal for the writing this plainly. It is my duty; and your Honour knoweth what danger want in such a time may do, and how people are disposed upon want to be mutinous; yet have I great cause to think they would suffer much hardness before they would do so. My Lord, I think there was never a more willing company to venture their lives in her Majesty's service than be here. Therefore it were pity they should lack at the time of service. If it be thought fit for us to be victualled for a longer time, it would¹ be gone in hand withal.

The Ark is arrived this morning here at Margate, wonderfully well trimmed and mended of her leak, which was a bolt forgotten to be driven in, and the outside covered with pitch, so it could not be seen; and when the sea had washed it off, then brake in the leak; and she was not well caulked in any place, but now most perfect. So I end to trouble your Lordship any further, praying God to send you health with your little strength. Margate Road, the 8th of April.

Your Lordship's most assured at command,
C. HOWARD.

April 9.—THE MAYOR OF LYME REGIS TO THE COUNCIL.

[ccix. 81.—Signed. Addressed.]

Right honourable Lords, our duties in most humble manner remembered:—It may please your Honours to understand that your honourable letters of the first of this April concerning making choice, putting in a readiness, and furnishing of certain shipping to serve under the conduct of Sir Francis Drake, Knight, were received the third of this said April, at 8 of the clock at night ; upon receipt whereof—for that there was not at the present, nor as yet, any ship here at home of the burden of 60 tons, but three small vessels far under that burden—we have made choice of one of the best and fittest of the same vessels for a pinnace, being handsome for the purpose and of the burden of 40 tons or thereabouts, called the Revenge of Lyme, whereof is owner and captain Richard Bedford. The which bark we have caused and appointed to be manned with thirty good mariners, and furnished for two months of victuals, munition, and other furniture, as with minions, falcons, fowlers, muskets, calivers, and with all other necessary provision for the wars. And so being furnished in a readiness, shall (by God's grace), with wind and weather convenient, be sent unto her Majesty's navy at Plymouth, by the time limited by the said letters accordingly.

And as concerning order for the levying of this charge—The said three towns of Lyme, Axminster and Chard, upon conference had together of the matter, have agreed that the whole charge thereof should only rise upon those persons amongst us that are set in subsidy to her Majesty, proportionably ; all which persons so set in subsidy do yield hereunto, saving certain persons of Axminster aforesaid, of sufficient ability, which refuse. Whereupon our humble request unto your Honours is that your Lordships would take further direction concerning those persons of Axminster so refusing, that they might likewise be contributory with us in the premises accordingly. And furthermore, we finding amongst us, of the said three towns, none that have received any benefit by reprisals, except one stranger very lately come in amongst us ; as also, divers of our merchants having received of late great losses in foreign countries, and chiefly in France, do humbly request your Honours that if hereafter we shall be further charged in like sort as afore, that we might by your honourable direction (to be taken in that behalf) have aid therein by others sufficient, dwelling in the towns near adjoining and trading amongst us. Thus leaving further to trouble your Lordships, do commit the same to the protection of the most Highest. From Lyme Regis, this 9th of April, Anno Domini 1588.

Your Lordships' at commandment, with all obedience,
 JOHN JONES, Mayor.

Sir:—I cannot express my pain newly increased in all my left arm. My spirits are even now so extenuated, as I have no mind towards anything but to groan with my pain. Therefore pardon me for not answering to you.

I am sorry to see more respect had to accidents than to the substance. Surely, Sir, as God will be best pleased with peace, so in nothing can her Majesty content her realm better than in procuring of peace; which if it cannot be had, yet is she excused afore God and the world. I have received many letters from the Lord Cobham urging my furtherance for resolution¹ of things; but I can only answer his expectation with my prayers. I am bold to send you two letters from Robert Cecill. When you have leisure to read them, I refer the longest to your consideration; only I would not that thereby we should be made slower in our preparations.

If you have an alphabet in cipher which I sent to her Majesty by Windebank,² to decipher Sir Edward Stafford's letters to her, I pray you let me have the use of it but for a day or two, and I will return it again.

And so, even forced with pain, even from my arm to my heart, I end. 10th of April, 1588.

Yours most assured,

² Thomas Windebank was in 1560 travelling tutor and governor to Burghley's elder son Thomas, afterwards first Earl of Exeter. In 1568 he was appointed Clerk of the Signet, and so continued till the death of the Queen. On his retirement, he was knighted by James I. Sir Francis Windebank, Secretary of State under Charles I, was his son.

EXETER TO THE COUNCIL.*

Our most humble and bounden duties remembered :—Having received your Honours' letters for the setting forth of three ships and a pinnace, to attend on Sir Francis Drake, we caused a present view to be taken of all our shipping, but found none left fit for that service, saving two only bound for Newfoundland, which were gotten out of the haven, and being still upon the coast are now stayed for this purpose ; which ships being of good burden, Sir Francis Drake, whom we have made it known unto, accepteth, rather than three others of lesser portage. But by reason your Honours' letters are directed only to Exeter and Topsham, all the rest of the places and creeks belonging to the Port of Exeter, whereunto the most number and best ships of the whole harbour doth belong, do allege that because they are not specially named in your Honours' letters, this service concerneth them not ; whereas in truth, there is but one serviceable ship of the said harbour in all, belonging in part to some of the inhabitants of this city, namely the Rose of Exeter, of the burden of one hundred tons or more ; which, being one of the two ships aforesaid, together with a fine pinnace, we mind, according to your Honours' direction, to cause to be thoroughly furnished and prepared by the appointed time, although the same will be to our very great charge ; most humbly beseeching your Honours to direct your honourable letters unto Topsham, Kenton, Exmouth, Lypstone, Sidmouth, Seaton, Colyton, Dawlish, Teignmouth, Tiverton and Collumpton, for the preparing of that other ship so stayed, or some other like, for the better furtherance of this her Majesty's service, which God prosper. To whose most gracious protection we most humbly recommend your Honours, with all humble dutifulness. Exon, the 11th of April, 1588.

April 12.—THE MAYOR AND ALDERMEN OF KING'S LYNN TO THE COUNCIL.

Right Honourable:—After we, the Mayor, Aldermen, and Company of the borough of King's Lynn, had received your honourable letters which were directed to this town of King's Lynn and the town of Blakeney, concerning the furnishing of two ships of war, either of them of the burden of 60 tons at the least, and one pinnace fit for that service, we had conference with some of the chiefest of the said town of Blakeney, and with some of the towns of Cley and Wiveton, which be members of the same town of Blakeney, and we find that they are unwilling to be at any charge near the furnishing of a ship. We sent also to the town of Wells, which is a member of our port, a town very well furnished with shipping, within which there be many rich men inhabiting; but they have denied altogether to contribute to our charge; and we made diligent enquiry if any of our port had sent forth any ship of war or taken any goods by way of reprisal, but we cannot find that there is any such. And we received your Honours' said letters the 7th of this month, before which time there were gone out from hence, for Iceland, six of the best ships of our town, and divers others into Holland and other places, so that we were left destitute of all ships fit for that service except one, called the Mayflower of Lynn, being of the burden of one hundred and fifty tons, of which we have made choice ; and we have chosen also one pinnace, of the burden of forty tons, and we intend, God so permitting, to furnish the said ship and pinnace with 100 men and all other things fit and necessary for her Majesty's wars. Howbeit, the truth is that our town is very unable to bear the charge thereof without assistance. Wherefore we humbly crave your Honours' letters to be directed to the towns of Cley, Wiveton, Blakeney, Wells, and other the coast towns towards Lynn, and to the dealers with corn, merchandise, and marine causes, in the towns near adjacent, commending them to join herein in the charge with us ; and we shall, according to our bounden duty, pray to God for your Honours' preservation. *April 12. - THE FALLIEFS OF IPSWICH TO

After our bounden duties to your Honour humbly remembered :—Where¹ we lately received letters from your Honour, and other of her Majesty's most honourable Privy Council, for the furnishing of two ships and one pinnace presently to be put in readiness and furnished by the towns of Ipswich and Harwich for two months with victuals, mariners, munition, and other necessary provision and furniture, to join with her Majesty's navy on the seas, or to be otherwise employed as we should be directed from their Honours or from the Lord High Admiral of England, mentioning therein that such merchants of those towns who had set forth ships in warlike sort by way of reprisal, supposed to have received great profit thereby, should bear the greater part of that burden :

And where¹ sythens it hath pleased the said Lord Admiral, by his letters to us and the inhabitants of the said town of Harwich directed, to require us to make choice of three sufficient and serviceable hoys instead of the said ships and pinnace, and to furnish them with six or eight of the meetest great serviceable ordnance for each of the same hoys, besides forty men in every such hoy, whereof most to be musketeers, as by the said letters this bearer hath ready to show to your Honour may appear :

We thereupon, according to our bound duties, have endeavoured ourselves to the uttermost of our power and abilities about the accomplishment of the premises, and cannot find or get sufficient great ordnance serviceable for the same. It would therefore please your Honour, for our better service of her Majesty, whereof we have a care, to be a mean for the obtaining of that kind of munition out of her Majesty's store in London or elsewhere.

And as touching the charge meant by the said letters to be imposed upon the said merchants who set forth ships by way of reprisal, we have imparted the contents of the said letters to the said merchants, who, for answer thereof, affirm that they have thereby rather sustained loss than gain ; so as there is no hope of obtaining any greater help of them towards that contribution than of the other inhabitants of the said town of Ipswich, rate for rate, unless we have further direction in that behalf from your Honour. And forasmuch as heretofore, in like cases of charge, we have found some very unwilling to contribute, and fear to find some such at this time, we humbly beseech your Honour's direction in that matter, what order we shall take with such as we shall find obstinate therein. And thus being willing in every behalf to the uttermost of our power to accomplish your Honour's former commandment, we humbly take our leaves of your Honour ; praying to Almighty God for your Honour, in health and goodly felicity, long to endure. EDWARD GOODDINGE

April 13.—SIR F. DRAKE TO THE QUEEN.

Most gracious Sovereign :—I have received from Mr. Secretary some particular notes, and withal a commandment to answer them unto your Majesty.

The first is that your Majesty would willingly be satisfied from me how the forces now in Lisbon might best be distressed.

Truly this point is hardly to be answered as yet, for two special causes : the first for that our intelligences are as yet uncertain ; the second is, the resolution of our own people, which I shall better understand when I have them at sea. The last insample at Cadiz is not of divers yet forgotten; for one such flying now, as Borough did then, will put the whole in peril, for that the enemy's strength is now so great gathered together and ready to invade.

But if your Majesty will give present order for our proceeding to the sea, and send to the strengthening of this fleet here four more of your Majesty's good ships, and those 16 sail of ships with their pinnaces which are preparing in London, then shall your Majesty stand assured, with God's assistance, that if the fleet come out of Lisbon, as long as we have victual to live withal upon that coast, they shall be fought with, and I hope, through the goodness of our merciful God, in such sort as shall hinder his quiet passage into England; for I assure your Majesty, I have not in my lifetime known better men, and possessed with gallanter minds, than your Majesty's people are for the most part, which are here gathered together, voluntarily to put their hands and hearts to the finishing of this great piece of work; wherein we are all persuaded that God, the giver of all victories, will in mercy look upon your most excellent Majesty, and us your poor subjects, who for the defence of your Majesty, our religion, and native country, have resolutely vowed the hazard of our lives.

The advantage of time and place in all martial actions is half a victory¹; which being lost is irrecoverable. Wherefore, if your Majesty will command me away with those ships which are here already, and the rest to follow with all possible expedition, I hold it in my poor opinion the surest and best course; and that they bring with them victuals sufficient for themselves and us, to the intent the service be not utterly lost for want thereof; whereof I most humbly beseech your most excellent Majesty to have such consideration as the weightiness of the cause requireth; for an Englishman, being far from his country, and seeing a present want of victuals to ensue, and perceiving no benefit to be looked for, but only blows, will hardly be brought to stay.

I have order but for two months' victuals, beginning the 24th of April, whereof one whole month may be spent before we come there; the other month's victual will be thought with the least to bring us back again. Here may the whole service and honour be lost for the sparing of a few crowns.

Touching my poor opinion how strong your Majesty's fleet should be to encounter this great force of the enemy, God increase your most excellent Majesty's forces both by sea and land daily; for this I surely think: there was never any force so strong as there is now ready or making ready against your Majesty and true religion; but that the Lord of all strengths is stronger, and will [defend] the truth of his word for his own name's sake; unto the which God be all glory given. Thus, in all humble duty, I continually will pray to the Almighty to bless and give you victory over all his and your enemies. From Plymouth, this 13th of April, 1588.

Your Majesty's most loyal,

FRA. DRAKE.

April 13.—HOWARD TO BURGHLEY.

[B.M. Harl. MS. 6994, f. 120.—Holograph. Addressed.]

My honourable good Lord:—I received even now a letter from Captain Frobiser; the effect was that there is come from the river of Seine, in France, six English ships, who declared unto him that there was great forces of soldiers come down to the sea coast, and that it is spoken there that word is brought by one that came out of Spain that the Spanish fleet is at the sea, and that, upon the news, the Frenchmen made great jollity and bravery, and came down to the English ships and cut their cables, and used them so badly as that they were driven to come away with all speed and leave all their business. And also Mr. Frobiser hath written that on Friday last, being the 5th of this present, there passed by Calais a hundred pilots, whereof two were Englishmen: they came in a flyboat from Dunkirk, and are gone to meet the Spanish fleet. Her Majesty's pleasure was that this letter should be sent to Sir Fr. Drake, for the wind being as it hath been ever since, it is like they should not be past the islands of Guernsey and Jersey, and therefore that he should send two or three nimble barks to intercept them, if it be possible, and also if they meet with any that cometh out of Spain, to learn what they can of the readiness of the army there, which in my opinion is readier than we do think they be. I would have been very glad to have seen your Lordship myself, but I could not obtain leave of her Majesty: and yet it were fit that I should make your Lordship acquainted with her Majesty's resolution touching the service on the seas, which, God willing, I will do before

I depart, if no sudden alarm¹ come, which I fear hourly.

My good friend Mr. Robert Cecill² did write me a letter, which I thank her Majesty she did read it over to me twice, with words of him that I was not sorry to hear. I am bold to send the letter unto your Lordship, praying your Lordship that after you have read it, that you will send it me again, for after her Majesty had read it twice unto me, she called for it again and read it to my Lord Steward.³ I pray to God to send your Lordship strength and health, and so I take my leave of your Lordship. From Hackney, the 13th of April.

Your Lordship's most assured to command,
C. HOWARD.

Right Honourable, our humble duties remembered:—Whereas we have received direction from you—for that it is supposed that divers merchants of this place have had great benefit by setting forth their ships in warlike sort by way of reprisal—that this port should furnish her Majesty with two ships and one pinnace, men, munition and victuals, for two months, and forthwith to join with her forces in the fleet under the conduct of Sir Francis Drake, Knight, admiral thereof: And⁴ before received order from the Lord Admiral for the like furnishing of two ships and one pinnace to join with her Highness's navy royal in the east parts. And whereas the 13th of this present, a general press of mariners hath been in this port, by means whereof this place, at this instant, is much destitute :

May it please your good Lordships to be advertised that the benefit of those reprisals hath not been in this place of that great estimation, although some quantity of such merchandise hath been here landed ; for that the proper owners thereof, in the greatest part, are of other places and not inhabitants in this port, being a town of small ability and in part decayed. And it may further please your Lordships, of our own industry, to our very great charge, we have builded a platform for some defence of this town and country, at this instant not thoroughly furnished with needful ordnance, by reason of our poverty not able thereunto. Yet notwithstanding, our very good Lords, tendering in all duty her Majesty's service, with desire to satisfy as near as we can your honourable commands in this behalf, [we] have at our own charge provided one ship of the burden of 80 tons, furnished with fifty men and victualled for two months, to join with Sir Francis Drake, and one pinnace of 30 tons, furnished with thirty men and victualled for two months, to attend the Lord Admiral, and now ready to depart this harbour according to their direction ; besides two other ships providing likewise for the Lord Admiral, by order from his Lordship. In consideration whereof, we beseech your Lordships to accept our willingness in any service we shall be commanded ; and for that the charge is very great to us only and the benefit general to inhabitants out of this place, it may please you in your grave consideration, partly to disburse us, by adding some townships near adjoining to be contributory towards the same, being so general service, and as well their goods as others; wherein we shall as heretofore most humbly acknowledge ourselves bounden unto your Lordships for your great care in relief of us. And so most humbly do take our leaves. Weymouth and Melcombe Regis, this 16th of April, 1588.

*April 17.—SIR ROBERT WYNGFELD¹ TO

Pleaseth it your Honours to understand that where it pleased you to direct your honourable letters to the towns of Aldborough, Orford and others, for the furnishing and setting out of a ship and a pinnace to the sea, meaning thereby, as it is supposed, that only those people that use the trade to sea should be chargeable to that service, and not those that are charged to find any furniture to land service: yet notwithstanding, the inhabitants of Orford have, for their own ease and to levy a far more sum than will suffice to that service, charged one Reuben Collye, and one Gilbert, and their servants, who are otherwise charged by land, to be contributories to their charge, and have threatened to compel them to appear before your Honours to answer such complaints as they will exhibit against them. And for that I know the men of small ability and charged otherwise, as abovesaid, I have thought good to signify so much unto your Lordships, most humbly entreating you that you will receive no information against them to their prejudice, for that I know them as ready any way to serve her Majesty as duty requireth. And so humbly take my leave, this 17th of April, 1588.

PETITION OF ORFORD AND DUNWICH TO THE COUNCIL.

[ccix. 96.—Not dated nor endorsed.]

To the Right Honourable the Lords and others of her Majesty's most honourable Privy Council.

In most humble wise beseeching your Honours, your poor and daily orators,¹ the chief officers and commonalties of the towns of Orford and Dunwich &c., in the county of Suffolk, that where² among themselves they cannot agree in the dissevering³ of the contribution and charge towards such shipping for her Majesty's service as on them and the town of Aldborough, in the said county, by your Honours' late letters was imposed; and only through Aldborough, as your Honours' said orators hope shall be adjudged; which notwithstanding, there is such order taken that the preparation in effect is ready which at all their hands was required: it⁴ would therefore please your Honours to address your letters to such knights and worshipful gentlemen as are next adjoining to those coast towns, who best know their several estates, for the imposing of every several town's charges for this service, ac-according to the validity of their several estates. And that it would please your Honours that the town of Woodbridge, their next neighbour, which was omitted, and which your Honours upon former humble petition granted, may contribute unto the charge of the said towns, and not to Ipswich, which is not so charged as your said orators be ; neither is Woodbridge—as they account themselves—a limb of that port of Ipswich, as Ipswich hath alleged. And your said orators, according to their bounden duty, shall and will daily pray for the continuance of your Honours in all health and honour.

May it please your good Lordships:—Immediately after the receipt of your letters of the first of this present,¹ which came to our hands the 6th of the same, whereby is signified her Majesty's pleasure that this town should prepare, furnish, man and set forth, at the proper charge of us and the rest of the inhabitants here, two ships and one pinnace to be employed in her Majesty's service, and for the defence of the realm, by the space of two months, we did, according to our duties and the abundance of our zeal and desire to do her Majesty faithful service, assemble ourselves together, as we have often done sithence the receipt of your Lordships' letters, to consider as well of the charge, as how the same might be levied among so poor and insufficient a number of inhabitants any way able to contribute towards the same ; and finding the charge to amount to five hundred pounds or thereabouts, we see it not possible how the same (no not the fourth part thereof) can be levied among us, in respect of the disability and poverty of the town, which ever sithence the embargo¹ in Spain, being about 16 years, hath grown from time to time so to decay, as within the half of that time there hath been almost no trade or traffic within this town ; whereby not only those among us that were of any reasonable estate of wealth or stock to exercise trade of merchandise are so low drawn and impoverished as² they have been constrained in effect to give up and forsake their traffic, but even the handicrafts men, which, by the common trade to this town, were in some competent sort maintained, are wonderfully decayed, and so the town dispeopled of many of her Majesty's natural subjects ; in whose places some few strangers of foreign countries are come to inhabit here, and they (God knoweth) but very poor, living with the labour of their hands.

Your Lordships will best consider the insufficiency of this place to furnish to so great a charge as five hundred pounds, when the whole subsidy within the same doth not amount to about a hundred and twenty pounds, and that gathered with much difficulty³ and murmurs of the people ; who, besides the said subsidy, have been of late charged by direction from your Lordships with the provision of certain powder and other munition to the sum of 250*l.*, which remaineth dead and without profit to the town ; and now lately charged with reparations about the town upon the sea banks, to defend⁴ the violence of the waters, with some little fortifications to strengthen the town against the enemy. And whereas your Lordships are of opinion that benefit hath grown to some of the inhabitants in this place by way of reprisals against the Spaniard, we dare assure your Lordships, upon our poor fidelity and credit, that the town hath thereby been impoverished at the least four thousand pounds.

Thus, our very good Lords, after we had often assembled ourselves, considered, and propounded the effect of your Lordships' letters to the principal and best able of the inhabitants,¹ and finding the state of this town so weak and unable to be strained to the charge of the preparation required, and that the motion² thereof made to the people doth cause them greatly to murmur and grieve thereat, having nevertheless travailed therein hitherto to our utmost, we have thought it necessary, under your Lordships' humble correction, as well in discharge of our duties towards her Majesty, as finding the necessity and poverty of the town so great, with all humility to entreat your good Lordships to be a means to her Majesty, that it will please her, of her princely bounty and clemency, to discharge this town wholly of that burden and charge, because if the same should be laid upon us, it must grow out of the purse of a very few of us so utterly unable to bear the same, as that it would tend greatly to our impoverishment and beggary.

And whereas your Lordships have happily been informed that there should³ be divers gentlemen inhabiting within this town of good ability whom you would have to contribute towards this charge, it may please your Lordships to be advertised that there is not above one gentleman that is inhabiting or remaining within the town that is not of the bourgeoisie of the same ; and the rest are very few, who have only hired some lodgings and houses in the town for some part of this winter past, and are either now gone or shortly do depart to their houses and charge in the country ; so as if for our better ease they should be taxed towards the furnishing of the charge aforesaid, it would be but a small relief that would thereby grow unto us.

Furthermore, if the town were able to reach to so great a contentment, whereof we should be right glad, as well for that her Majesty's service might be furthered and advanced thereby, as that our town were in case of ability thereunto, yet we must let your Lordships understand that sithence the receipt of your letters before mentioned there have been prested and taken up within this town by John Thomas and John Younge, having her Majesty's commission under the Great Seal of England, above a hundred and ten mariners ; whereby, if we were able to levy the charge among us, it were not possible for us to find so many fit mariners in those parts as might serve to man the meanest of the three ships required.

These lacks and impediments therefore considered, we do most humbly pray and hope that her Majesty and your Lordships will have compassion of the poverty and inability of this poor town in remitting and discharging the same of the shipping, charge and furniture required, assuring your Lordships that it will be an act of great charity towards us, and we shall be bound to pray for her Majesty and your Lordships (as we do daily), and to be ready to expose our lives and slender substance to do her Majesty service when and where it shall please her Majesty to employ and command us, as knoweth God ; to whose holy protection we do most humbly leave your good

My very good Lord :—It is now determined that I shall go westward with the greatest part of her Majesty's ships, whereof I have thought good to advertise your Lordship. The purpose and conclusion of her Majesty's intent, Sir William Wynter or Mr. Hawkyens will advertise your Lordship at large.

I wrote to your Lordship before this long since of sundry extraordinary charges that were then grown in furnishing of the navy, which doth daily increase many ways ; therefore I heartily pray your Lordship that there may be paid 2,000*l.* out of the warrant of 29,000, bearing date the second of February, 1586 ; whereby her Majesty's navy may be the better furnished, and thereby more able to do her and this realm service. After our bounden duties to your Honour humbly remembered :—Where we lastly received your Honour's most favourable letters on the behalf of the town of Ipswich, for the obtaining of great ordnance for our better furnishing of three serviceable hoys for her Majesty against her Highness's enemies, by your Honour's means, of¹ the Right Honourable the Lord High Admiral of England ; for which we render to your Honour our most humble and dutiful thanks. And therefore we have hereby made so bold, eftsoons² to commend the same to your Honour for further remembrance towards my said Lord Admiral in that behalf, by your Honour's letters to his Lordship, or otherwise as shall seem best for the accomplishment thereof, at the time and place by his Honour appointed ; for that otherwise, we cannot furnish the same as we most willingly would, according to our duties. And therefore have sent this bearer to attend your Honour's direction therein, for that the time appointed for that service approacheth so nigh at hand.

And further, if it shall like your Honour, we having considered of the great charge of the said hoys, do perceive that the charge thereof will amount to four whole subsidies, to be borne by the said inhabitants ; and thereupon, having sithence proportionably rated ourselves and the other inhabitants of the said town of Ipswich able to contribute, according to their abilities, for the setting forth of the said hoys in warlike manner, one Ralph Morrys, gent and inhabitant of the said town, and a man of sufficient ability to bear the burden and charge set upon him, hath most obstinately refused to pay his said rate cessed upon him, to the evil example of others, if he shall so pass away. Whereupon we, according to your Honour's direction, have bound him by obligation herewith sent, to her Majesty's use in the sum of one hundred marks to make his personal appearance before the Lords and others of her Majesty's most honourable Privy Council on Saint Mark's day¹ next coming, to abide their Honours' order, whereunto as duty bindeth us we submit ourselves. Right Honourable, our duties humbly remembered:—Understanding to our great grief your Honour's misliking of our late certificate, made to the Lords and others of her Majesty's most honourable Privy Council, of the lack of sufficient ships and mariners here to furnish from hence two ships and one pinnace, according to their Lordships' direction, by means of their absence upon their traffic, and the late press made by one Christopher Chapman:— We therefore, encouraged by your Honour's accustomed good affection to this town and the inhabitants thereof, and the good liking you have had of our readiness and willingness in her Majesty's service, and being very sorry to minister any cause whereby the same, your Honour's good affection and liking should be any way withdrawn, are emboldened to trouble your Honour with these few lines, and thereby to advertise you that in truth the lack was no less than was at that time certified, which we shall be ready evidently to prove, if it shall so please your Honour, and that we could not by any means have furnished the said ships and pinnace; but that sithence that time, there be both ships and mariners returned from London and Newcastle; whereupon, in part discharge of our bounden duties, and in accomplishment of the contents of their Lordships' letter in that behalf to us written, we have appointed for that service two ships and one pinnace, as most willingly we would have done at the first if by any means possible we could; which, with as much expedition as possible may be, shall be furnished and set forth, which we trust will be the 25th of April instant; for we, for the more speedier dispatch therein, have hired and set to work of them all the ship-carpenters in this town or in any place within twenty miles thereof. The names of the ships and pinnace and their burdens and in what sort they are furnished is set down in a particular note enclosed in our letter¹ to the Lords and others of her Majesty's most honourable Privy

Council, which the bringer hereof hath to deliver to your Honour. And thus, humbly beseeching your Honour to accept this our boldness, to continue your accustomed good affection to us and this town, and to impute our slackness in this service to the lack of serviceable ships and mariners, the true and only cause thereof, we humbly take our leaves ; beseeching the Almighty to preserve your Honour in long health, with much increase of honour. *April 20.—THE JUSTICES OF EAST
BERGHOLT TO THE COUNCIL.*

Right Honourable :—May it please you to vouchsafe the reading of a most humble petition which the township of East Bergholt, in Suffolk, have instantly required us to present unto your Honours in answer of your letter of the tenth of April, wherein they are required to make some reasonable contribution towards the furnishing of a ship and pinnace to be sent out of Colchester, in Essex ; and we the justices of these limits, at whose hands all due vigilancy for her Majesty's service may be required, have thought it our parts and bounden duties, under your favourable correction, to lay open some particularities that may move your honourable com-passions towards the said township and decayed state of this poor corner, growing chiefly (if we be rightly informed) by restraint made by a statute prohibiting that no Suffolk cloth should be transported, and not here dressed before they were embarked, thereby changing the accustomed gainful trade, and traded with such cloths making¹ as were best saleable in Spain ; and now through long want of vent into those parts, we find not only the stocks and wealth of the said inhabitants greatly decayed, but withal they, being very charitable and godly bent, are driven, out of their own purses, to see all the poor and needy artificers pertaining to the trade provided for sufficiently with meat, drink and clothes, without trouble of any other parts ; which amounts to so great a charge, the number of the poor being very many, as² we hope according to your accustomed wisdoms you will take favourable regard of them. Their readiness and forwardness otherwise, in all the good services of God and her most excellent Majesty, are and hath been always such as deserveth the testimony of our hands, in hope thereby to purchase your Honours' good and gracious favour towards both them and ourselves, who in all humility will become humble suitors to your honourable good Lordships as far as we may without offence, that we may not weaken our country to strengthen another, and our coasts and coast men already so weakened as we hold it fit for us rather with all due care and circumspection to foresee how to strengthen the services of her Majesty in these parts for such shipping as is in like manner allotted hither, in the furtherance whereof there had been ere this used the help of the said town of Bergholt and others if their estate would so have borne it. And so, our most humble duties recommended, with our hearty

April 28.—DRAKE TO THE QUEEN.

Most gracious Sovereign :—Sithence my last dispatch of Mr. Stallenge to the Court, I have three sundry ways received advertisements that the enemy continueth his preparations very mightily. The first report cometh by a man of Dartmouth who very lately came from St. Malos, and saith that he heard it reported there by divers Frenchmen returned home from Spain over land, that fifteen ships of that town and as many (at least) of Rosco,² besides many more of divers nations, are stayed there ; affirming that their fleet is in number between four and five hundred sail, ready furnished with seventy or eighty thousand soldiers and mariners³ ; and that for their better encouragement the wages of all the companies is advanced.

The second was delivered by one coming lately from Bayonne, who upon conference there had with another Englishman that dwelt at Bilbao doth confirm in effect the substance of the former reports ; adding also that there went to Lisbon out of Biscay between forty or fifty sail of tall ships to increase their fleet.

² Roscoff. It seems at this time to have had a considerable trade (cf. post, Seymour to Walsingham, July 18), which afterwards died out, leaving the town to dwindle to 'an insignificant hamlet,' till, in 1769, it suddenly started to life again as the depôt of smugglers. See Shore's Smuggling Days and Smuggling Ways, p. 87.

The last report is certainly declared ¹ in France, and brought over by a merchant of Lyme, named Hasserde, that a Frenchman lately coming out of the Straits meant to put in at Cadiz ; and sending in his boat in the night, to discover such doubts as might annoy his entry there, had intelligence by one of his countrymen that they and their shipping were generally stayed in all ports of the coast, and their sails and yards landed ; and that if he came also in, he might not pass thence. Farther he reported that there were within that harbour twelve great argosies, the least of a thousand tons, and so upwards to the burden of fifteen hundred ; taking into them (for the most part) straw, barley, and other forage for those horses and asses which were ordained for their necessary carriage.

Most renowned Prince, I beseech you to pardon my boldness in the discharge of my conscience, being burdened to signify unto your Highness the imminent dangers that in my simple opinion do hang over us : that if a good peace for your Majesty be not forthwith concluded—which I as much as any man desireth—then these great preparations of the Spaniard may be speedily prevented as much as in your Majesty lieth, by sending your forces to encounter them somewhat far off, and more near their own coasts, which will be the better cheap² for your Majesty and people, and much the dearer for the enemy.

Thus much (as duty bindeth me) I have thought good to signify unto your Majesty, for that it importeth but the hazard or loss of all. The promise of peace from the Prince of Parma and these mighty preparations in Spain agree not well together. Undoubtedly I think these advertisements true, for that I cannot hear, by any man of war or otherwise, that any ship is permitted to depart Spain, which is a vehement presumption that they hold their purposed pretences.¹ And for farther testimony of these reports, I have sent this bearer, a captain of one of your Majesty's ships, who (if it shall please your Highness to permit him) can deliver some things touching the same.

Thus resting always most bounden unto your Majesty for your gracious and favourable speeches used of me both to Mr. Secretary and others (which I desire God no longer to let me live than I will be ready to do your Majesty all the dutiful service I possibly may). I will continually pray to God to biess your Majesty with all happy victories. From Plymouth, this 28th of April, 1588.

Your Majesty's most loyal,
FRA. DRAKE.

April.—ADVERTISEMENTS FROM ROUEN.

First, these are to certify you that yesterday there arrived here a Breton called Roderigues Haimond, who 13 days past departed from Cadiz in Spain, at which time all the ships, as well French as Flemish, were stayed until such time as the Spanish fleet should be departed, so that if a ship of Marseille had not touched at Cadiz in passing that way, neither this party nor none else could have come out of Spain by sea, until after the departure of the army. Which time, stay was made, for that no news should be carried for England. Touching the news he hath brought, what the army is and when they purpose to depart, and whither the talk went that they meant to shape their course,—First, he saith that in all there may be 200 sail of ships, whereof the more part is almost all arrayed at Lisbon, if, since he be come away, they be not departed; and that 14 of the greatest galleons are at St. Lucar. Also that to man these ships, as the talk goeth in Spain, there are 30,000 men ready to go aboard when time serveth. Secondly, for the time of their departure, he saith that the common voices was that the galleons should depart from St. Lucar, and all the rest of the fleet, about the end of this month; and he thinketh it to be the more certain, for that the news was there that the Duke of Medina, Admiral of Spain, had already received the King's packet, which was not to be opened till he should be at sea with all the fleet, so that no man could certainly tell to what place they should go after the departure from Spain ; but the place whither, according to the common bruit, it was by most men in Spain said that they meant to go for Scotland there to land, but of this there is no certainty that the party now arrived could tell. I demanded him if corn was cheap and victuals in Spain. He said that it was very reasonable for price, and plenty sufficient ; and that this year there is like to be great plenty by reason of the moist spring. Finally I prayed him to tell me what news he heard of Sir Francis Drake ; and he said that whilst he was at Cadiz the Spaniards made two alarms, and put themselves all in arms, because they saw certain great ships making in towards the bay, which they thought had been Sir Francis Drake ; and for his own opinion, being one who loveth Englishmen, he thinketh that the Spaniards will never be able to accomplish their determination, for he thinketh they are too weak at sea, and I do not doubt, God willing, they shall be overthrown.

May 10.—RESOLUTIONS OF THE COUNCIL.

[ccx. 11.—Endorsed.]

1. To appoint a proportion of money to be delivered unto the Treasurer to provide victual in case of necessity.
2. The ships furnished by the port towns, so many as have two months' victual, to remain in the Narrow Seas ; and the other, furnished with three months' victual, to attend upon the Lord Admiral.
3. The instructions to refer the employment of the navy that is to repair to the west parts of this realm, to the Lord Admiral's consideration ; to be employed as by his Lordship shall be thought meet, upon such intelligence as he shall receive from time to time ; having care, so much as lie in him, to impeach any attempt in Ireland, in Scotland, and England.

May 12.—FENNER AND CROSSE TO DRAKE.¹

[cox. 17.—Signed. Addressed :—For her Majesty's service.]

Sir :—There arrived this 12th May in the morning Captain Polwhele² and the rest of the ships in company, all saving the caravel. He was at Cape Finisterre and encountered with certain French ships, the ladings of many of them supposed to be Spaniards' goods ; as also one flyboat ; which ships came from several places out of the kingdoms of Spain and Portugal. So as therefore he thought meet to return with them, for the better advertisement of the estate of the King's forts and fleet, and of their readiness, as by the examinations of divers of the masters and merchants by this bearer sent unto you at large appeareth. And in that they generally, coming out of many several places, confirm in effect all one matter, we thought it very meet to despatch away a messenger with all haste, and therefore have taken their examinations brielly for the speedier despatch.

Most of them marvelleth that the fleet is not upon this coast. There are six French ships and one flyboat brought in by Captain Polwhele ; he hath great care to keep everything in good order, without spoil. Presently after this messenger's despatch we mean to take special order for the safety of everything, and to take as due examination of the parties unto whom the goods doth appertain as our knowledge can bring to pass.

Here are arrived all the ships from Bristol and all the west parts with Sir Richard Greynvile¹ and Mr. St. Leger, for which two we pray your consideration in moneys they demand for victual. We take order upon this news that the fleet shall be maintained until Saturday next with petty warrants, so as the two months' store shall be kept whole.

We have observed the order of your letter sent by my cousin William Fenner, and we despatch of the worst men with as much speed as we may, notwithstanding there will be above the numbers. All the ships here are wonderfully well manned with mariners.

We will take a special care as may be to our charge in your absence; foreseeing, as much as may lie in us, that all be kept in good order and with as much readiness as the place will yield. We ride in a hole² where we cannot get out if the enemy should come. Divers of the best ships shall remove out of that place with as much speed as we may under the island,³ to be the readier for their coming, or to follow them as occasion shall move. The mariners shall be kept aboard, and the soldiers in as great readiness as may be. We will order some powder and weapons aboard such ships as have not already.

Captain Polwhele had performed this message himself, but that we thought it meet, such his great care⁴ in good order for the safety of the goods as

We do most humbly commend ourselves unto you, wishing honour and happiness in all your actions. And so we commit you to the Lord of Lords, who preserve and keep you in his favour for ever. Plymouth, this 12th of May, 1588, at 7 of the clock in the evening.

May 16.—SEYMOUR TO WALSYNGHAM.

[ccx. 19.—Holograph. Addressed.]

Sir:—Where news be daily current, be they good or bad, true or false, such I receive them, such I deliver them. This evening there came a pinnace into the Road which came from Cadiz in Spain this day fortnight. He delivereth unto me for certain there be in Lisbon 300 sail, half of them victuallers and the other half men of war; besides which they are greatly infected with sickness and mortality, and that they stand greatly upon their guard, hearing but of the name of Drake to approach them; further, that they be marvellously beset both with Moors and Turks, insomuch as operations of the summer. He was probably promoted to be master of one of the large ships, but there is no further mention of him this season. He is named by Hakluyt (Principal Navigations, iii. 840) as being lost with Chidley in the expedition to the Straits of Magellan in 1589.

the Moors have within these six weeks overthrown 20,000 Spaniards, obtaining three notable towns besides in that country.¹ He addeth further that the Great Turk doth presently make a great army ready to set the same forward to some great purpose, whereof the Spaniards stand in some fear. So as truly, Sir, in my poor opinion, if these news be true, her Majesty cannot but in manner make what peace she list; so much the rather, when her forces shall be seen ready upon the coasts everywhere, which me thinketh is too long deferred.

The author of these news is a Frenchman dwelling at Cadiz, laden with good Spanish wines and sacks,² and so cometh to London with some leisure as the wind will give him leave. This leaving any further to trouble you, do recommend me always to your honourable good favour. From aboard the Bonaventure, this 16th of May, 1588.

Your assured loving friend to command,
H. SEYMOUR.

Post.—If it please you to have any further conference with this Frenchman, you shall hear of him at one Gerald Malines, a Fleming, who is resident always at London, and doth receive these wines at his hands. The names of the towns that are conquered by the Moors he knoweth not, but surely,³ Sir, all things be not current with the Duke of Parma, if her Majesty had a honourable peace.

EXTRACTS OF LETTERS WRITTEN FROM LISBON.

[ccx. 20.—Englished.]

Antonio de Taso Aquereis,¹ Alferez of two hundred soldiers, writing three letters out of Lisbon into Andalusia, saith as followeth:—

In the first letter:

Do you pray to God that in England he doth give me a house of some very rich merchant where I may place my ensigne, which the owner thereof do ransom of me in thirty thousand ducats. But I do fear that seeing us they will presently yield and agree unto all that the King will demand of them, for that the King's force is marvellous great as well by sea as by land.

In the second letter:

Do you incommend² me in your prayers to God that he give me a good voyage and fortune that I may get wherewithal to repair to my house to live at ease. I am embarked in the admiral of the hulks, a very good and new ship; only I do fear we shall not join battle, for that the great force the King hath is such; and again that the Prince of Parma hath, who stayeth for us with thirty thousand men in the field, and hath sent unto the King craving leave that he only may give the onset, and the King will not grant it him until the Duke do join with him. All things are embarked even to the mules³ that must draw the artillery; and commanded here, upon pain of death, no man to go ashore; only we do tarry for a fair wind to go to sea. There is given every day two and twenty thousand rations of victual unto the people for sea and land, all Spaniards.

The third letter :

As touching the voyage, it is impossible to signify unto you the people that are therein, as well soldiers, gentlemen, as of noblemen; only I can say that every day is given twenty two thousand rations of meat, and this only to Spaniards, besides strangers. All things are embarked, only tarrying for a wind; and is commanded upon pain of death no man to disembark himself. I pray you to write me when our supply doth come, which now is making ready.

May 22.—SEYMOUR TO BURGHLEY.

My very good Lord :—The Lord Admiral and I parted our companies on the Narrow Seas the 21st of this month, his Lordship taking his course to Plymouth, having a very good wind for the purpose, and myself to Blackness, where I anchored the same day. Presently Monsieur d'Aumale² sent a messenger unto me, desiring me to command anything what I lacked, either for victuals, munition, powder or shot. I heartily thanked him, and told the messenger that her Majesty was well stored of all necessaries to offend her enemies ; adding further that her Highness could not but take his message in better part, considering the league between her and the French King ; yet marvelling not a little that so honourable a house as the Guise, being advanced by French kings heretofore, could forget themselves so far as to put themselves in arms, thereby to rob him of one of his principal towns, which was most like to be done without warrant or commission from his sovereign. To this was answered that the French King and the Duke of Guise were both at Paris, within these four days, and become great friends ; assuring me further that he would not fail to bring me letters from Monsieur d'Aumale that should witness the same ; as also farther authority from the French King to wish¹ him to expel the Duke of Parma his lieutenant out of Boulogne ; all which I have expected all this morning until noon, at which time the wind changed at North and by West, and thereby enforced [us] to sail over to our own coasts again.

I am further advertised that they of the higher town of Boulogne are able to hold out a twelve months, being furnished of all necessaries to withstand the siege. Besides they made a sally forth upon the Duke d'Aumale the same day he came first to Boulogne in person, which was on Friday last was sennight, and slew 16 persons outright, hurting many, besides taking a prisoner of some account, with his ensign.

Now, my Lord, touching our fleet, I would gladly understand your pleasure for the revictualling our navy, as also what order shall be taken for our coast men ; whether her Majesty or the towns shall continue the charge. It is time to consider hereof, for our victuals and days wear away apace. I have nothing else to trouble your Lordship, but leave you to the merciful protection of the Almighty. From aboard the Rainbow,¹ this 22nd of May, 1588.

May 23.—HOWARD TO BURGHLEY.

[ccx. 28.—Signed, and autograph postscript. Addressed.]

My honourable good Lord:—Although I have not much matter worthy the writing unto your Lordship at this present, yet I thought good to let your Lordship understand how that upon Tuesday last, being the 21st of this instant, the wind serving exceedingly well, I cut² sail at the Downs, assigning unto my Lord Henry Seymour those ships appointed to stay with him on the Narrow Seas; and so parting companies the same morning athwart of Dover, and with a pleasant gale all the way long, came and arrived this day, being the 23rd, about 8 of the clock in the morning, at this port of Plymouth, whence Sir Francis Drake came forth with 60 sail very well appointed to meet with me; and so casting about, he put with me into the haven again, where I mean to stay these two days to water our fleet, and afterwards, God willing, to take the opportunity of the first wind serving for the coast of Spain, with intention to lie on and off betwixt England and that coast, to watch the coming of the Spanish forces; which I doubt not, if God send us the good hap to meet them, but that in like sort he will send us a good success to conquer and overcome them. Unto whom I commend your good Lordship, and so bid you most heartily well to fare. From Plymouth, the 23rd of May, 1588.

Your Lordship's most assured to command,
C. HOWARD.

My good Lord, I pray you bear with me that I have not written¹ with my own hand. I am so busied as² I have no leisure, for now there is no losing of time.

May 27.—WYNTER TO BURGHLEY.

[ccx. 32.—Signed. Addressed.]

My singular good Lord :—It doth appear to me by a letter which I received of late written by your Lordship and Mr. Secretary Walsyngham as from her Majesty, how greatly I am bound to her Highness, which I know is increased by the honourable favour that doth always continue in you towards me. I do and will pray for her Majesty to Almighty God, and ever live, by his goodness, as her most bounden, humble and dutiful servant, and always honour and love you.

Since my Lord Admiral's departure, I have been a-land at Dover pier to behold the works, as one that wisheth well to it ; and I do find that the works which is done are great, and the same which doth want will be overcome with a reasonable charge being now followed. There is a place in the entering of the harbour, which lieth on the north side, to the eastward, that is fallen into decay, which would³ be taken in hand forthwith and mended ; for otherwise it would put the harbour in danger in short time, and that I would be very sorry to hear.

The sending of victuals from London or Chatham to such of her Majesty's ships as serveth in the Narrow Seas is a great charge to her Highness ; beside the uncertain coming of it, and the danger the vessel doth run in, which transporteth the same ; and besides, the hurt the victual receiveth or¹ it can be laid aboard. Which matter, in my opinion, would be easily holpen, as by taking order that the victuals, to serve the ships which should be here, be made in Dover, from which it will be very easy for the ships to fetch it, or else for the victualler to send the same to them.

And as for other matters belonging to our Admiral's charge, I know his Lordship doth acquaint your Lordship and the rest of my good Lords with that which is needful, and therefore I leave to trouble your Lordship therein ; and so most humbly taking my leave, I desire God to make you ever happy. Written from aboard the Vanguard, the 27th of May, 1588.

Your honourable Lordship's most bounden,
W. WYNTER.

*May 28.—THE DECLARATION OF

[ccx. 33.]

The declaration of Giles Napper, come out of Spain the sixth of May,² by their computation, and arrived here at Portsmouth the 28th day of May, after our computation.

He saith he was first taken by the Turks, in a ship of Sir Thomas Leighton's ; and afterwards, rowing in the Turks' galleys, taken by the Spaniards and put in the Spanish galleys, and remained there a year and a half ; and afterwards, he procured a Fleming to write to the King in his behalf, that for so much as he had been in captivity in Barbary two years and a half, to know his pleasure whether he should be released or kept still in the galley. And the King answered that he should serve in the galleys as a mariner, and not as a captive ; but he being unwilling thereunto, desired to be released out of the galleys, which the general did grant, paying his duties. And so he was put to serve in the country, and served a Venetian a month, and afterwards agreed with a Frenchman to bring him to St. Malo. And there were there 30 sail of Flemings, Frenchmen, and Scots, that were there imbarred¹ under the Castle of Puntales, which was lately made² for fear of Captain Drake ; and they came all away together ; and the Castle shot at them and smote never a man ; but a piece broke in the Castle and smote many of the soldiers.

Upon the last of March,³ after the Spanish computation, there came a Scot from Lisbon to Cadiz, and he asked him what store of shipping there was at Lisbon ; who told him that there was a hundred great ships and some galleasses, so that they were 200 sail of great and small ; and they looked to come away, by report of the common people, the 16th of May,⁴ by their computation ; and they looked for more ships out of Italy to be ready at that time.

Also he saith that he spake with one Mr. Fletcher, at that time, being an Englishman at Cadiz, in April last, who hath a factor in Lisbon who desired his master to send for him from thence. The sickness increased, so that there died in a day, in the fleet and in the town, four score or a hundred. And then there was such hate between the Portugals and the Spaniards that they were almost at open wars.

Also he saith that the report amongst the common people is that they think the Englishmen will be hard for them at sea ; but if they set their foot on land, they hope to find some friends ; and they say they look for help of the Scots. And the King of Spain himself commended Sir Francis Drake very much, to be a valiant man of war, saying that if he had him there he would use him well enough.

Also he saith that they make great account of the Dunkirk fleet, which is thought to be about 30 or 40 thousand men ; and that they make as great account of that company as that which they bring from Spain.

Also they talked closely¹ that there was a fleet preparing to go to Guinea and the Indies ; and he saw ten ships lading wines for that voyage ; they appointed to go about midsummer. The wine they carry is called² a strong wine, and is bound with iron hoops.

Also he saith that Antonio Olivarez and Pedro Castillo be the principal officers for the King at Cadiz and St. Mary Port, and that they demanded of those French ships and others that came away a hundred of oldernes,³ which was worth there 900 ducats, and then they should depart ; which when they had provided and delivered, they answered they could by no means suffer them to pass.

Whereupon the French and others found themselves grieved ; which they perceiving, commanded presently their sails to be taken from them ; nevertheless, they conveyed some of their sails into casks, with the which they came now away.

Also he saith that the 25th of this present he came from St. Malo in Brittany, where the report was that the Parisians demand of the King whether they should accept of the Duke of Guise. And the King answering nothing, nodded his head ; whereupon some of them afterwards pronounced *Vive le roi Guise !*¹

Also he saith that many of the better sort there do judge that all this is but a policy and device between the King and the Guise for some greater matter. And although the Guise be favoured of some, yet is he disliked of many.

May 28.—SEYMOUR TO WALSYNGHAM.

Sir:—According to your direction, I send you here enclosed a perfect particular of our coast men, both of shipping, numbers of men, as also the proportion of victuals, as well the beginning as the ending thereof. So as all that I am to desire you is that, hereafter, we be supplied of victuals at the least for six weeks, if so be that her Majesty make any account of service to be done ; for truly, Sir, without care and regard had of us, what with taking our months' victuals in, there are so many days spent in vain, that no manner of service can be attempted, by reason they consume so fast. And great reason is there to consider hereof; specially when any exploits are to be tendered either for the Low Countries, Scotland, or the west parts. Thus, having nothing else to trouble you, do take my leave. From aboard the Rainbow, this 28th of May, 1588.

Your assured friend to command,
H. SEYMOUR.

Post.—Sir William Wynter doth humbly desire you to put his letter within your packet, when you have any occasion to send unto my Lord Admiral.

May 27.—THE PERFECT PARTICULAR OF COAST MEN.

[ccx. 34, I.—Enclosure in Seymour's letter of May 28.]

27th of May, 1588.—The names of the ships, hoys &c. set forth by the several towns underwritten, with the captains' names,¹ number of men,¹ their several tonnage,¹ and the quantity of victuals in them remaining the day of the date hereof; which ships, hoys &c. do serve under me, the Lord Henry Seymour, admiral of her Majesty's navy serving in the Narrow Seas, viz. :—

Newcastle.—Daniel (24); Galleon Hutchins (24); Bark Lamb (24); Fancy (24).

Hull.—Griffin (25); Little Hare (25); Handmaid (25).

Ipswich.—Hoys: William (30); Katharine (30); Primrose (30).

Lynn.—Mayflower (35); Susan (35).

Yarmouth.—Grace (35).
 Lowestoft.—Matthew (21).
 Alborough.—Marigold (21).
 Colchester.—William of Brightlingsea.¹
 Dover.—Elizabeth² (50).
 Sandwich.—Reuben (50).
 Feversham.—Hazard (30).
 Hythe.—Grace of God (34).
 Romney.—John (3).

May 28.—HOWARD TO BURGHLEY.

[ccx. 35.—Signed, and autograph postscript. Addressed.]

My very good Lord :—I have received a letter from my man Burnell,⁴ whom I left to come after us with the ten ships with victuals. I perceive by his letter that the ships, and also the victuals, be nothing in that readiness that I looked they should be in,

² Here, and in some other lists, this ship appears as Elinathan, or Ellen Nathan. Elizabeth, as in ccxv. 76 and elsewhere, is no doubt correct.

³ Not stated.

nor as Mr. Quarles did promise me; for he did ensure me that within seven or eight days at the farthest, they should be dispatched after my departure from the Court, which was the 14th of this month. Burnell's letter unto me beareth date of the 20th, and signifieth unto me that Mr. Quarles and Mr. Peter told him that it would not be ready to depart in 12 or 14 days after; and besides, that the ships were in no readiness that should bring it, and that there would be no mariners gotten for them. My Lord, I judged it would be so; for when there is more care had of the merchants' traffic than there is of such matter of importance as this is, it is like it will be no better.

My Lord, we have here now but 18 days' victual, and there is none to be gotten in all this country; and what that is to go withal to sea, your Lordship may judge; and to tarry, that we must not. For even this morning, Mr. Cary,¹ the sheriff of Devonshire, and Sir Richard Greynville have brought me word of a bark that is come newly from the South Cape,² and was there within these seven days, and did take two or three fishermen off that place, who told them that the Spanish fleet was to come out with the first wind. And therefore very likely that, now the wind being so good for them, they are coming out. And therefore, God willing, the first wind that will serve to put us out, we will be gone towards them; for we have done watering and only are watching here for a wind, all things else being in a readiness. God send us a wind to put us out; for go we will, though we starve. The fault is not mine. We must do as God will provide for us. But, my Lord, it would have done well that they that are gone or going to Stade or Russia¹ had staid until these ships with our victuals had come to us. Your Lordship doth know what want of victuals did breed once in Ireland, when there were but four of her Majesty's ships with George Wynter²; and in like sort, when Sir William Wynter was there. God knoweth what this may do; and our ships that should have come with victual, if they had come hither, we might have taken it well in; but it will be now hard for them to find us, for God knoweth which way the Spanish fleet will bend, either to England, Ireland, or Scotland. But I mean to leave a bark here to bring them after us, for we will lie in the Sleeve³ as long as we may, except there be cause to the contrary.

There is another bark come from the coast of Spain, belonging to Sir George Carey,⁴ and past by this way towards the Isle of Wight; who doth report that the Spanish forces, for certainty, do set out as yesterday. We have the like advertisements out of France, by divers several barks that are come thence. God send the wind to serve to put us out; for I believe surely, if the wind hold here but six days, they will knock at our door. If they do so, the fault is not ours ; for I hope¹ we have lost no one hour nor minute of time, nor will suffer any hereafter to be lost. Therefore I pray you, good my Lord, to cause our victuals to be hastened after us with all speed ; and to speak to Mr. Quarles that there may some supply be made again against anything that may happen. And so I bid your good Lordship heartily farewell. From Plymouth, the 28th of May, 1588.

² George Wynter, brother or cousin of Sir William, commanded a squadron of three of the Queen's ships on the coast of Ireland in 1577. He was ordered to cruise between the Cape of Cornwall and the River Shannon, looking out for a Frenchman named La Roche, who was reported to be preparing some private expedition against Ireland; and to stay out as long as his victuals lasted. The squadron went to the seas on July 20, and returned on October 18; but there does not seem to be any record of the trouble to which Howard refers. S.P. Dom. Eliz. cxiv. 60; cxvii. 1.

Your Lordship's very loving friend to command,
C. HOWARD.

I pray you let this messenger be returned with some speed ; for although the wind do come to suit us and that we be gone, I will leave a pinnacle to bring him after me.

May 28.—HOWARD TO BURGHLEY.

[ccx. 36.—Signed, and autograph postscript. Addressed.]

My very good Lord :—I have received your Lordship's letter of the 22nd of this instant, wherein you desire that a certain ship, called the Mary of Hamburg, stayed at Plymouth, may be suffered to pass with her lading of rice, almonds, and other goods, to London, whither she is bound.

Your Lordship shall understand that we have scarcely three weeks' victuals left in our fleet, being bound in by the wind, and watching the first opportunity of the same to go forth unto the seas ; and that therefore, for our better provision and prolonging of our victuals, I have caused the said rice to be stayed and taken for her Majesty's use, paying for the same as it is valued at. And for the ship, and the rest of her lading, I will give order that she may pass hence to London, according to your Lordship's request. And so I bid your Lordship most heartily well to fare. From Plymouth, the 28th of May, 1588.

Your Lordship's very loving friend to command,
C. HOWARD.

My good Lord, there is here the gallantest¹ company of captains, soldiers,² and mariners that I think ever was seen in England. It were pity they should lack meat,³ when they are so desirous to spend their lives in her Majesty's service.⁴

I would to God I did know how the world went with our Commissioners; for if I know nothing I must do thereafter, and think of the worst. I pray God all things be in best readiness, if the worst do fall out. And God send us the happiness to meet with them before our men on the land discover them, for I fear me a little sight of the enemy will fear the land men much.

*REASONS WHY THE SPANIARDS SHOULD

[ccx. 47.—Endorsed. Not dated.]

Reasons why the Spaniards should rather land in the Isle of Wight than any other place of England.

If by this preparation of the ships and the galleys, an invasion be intended to any part of England—then, entering into consideration what ports are fittest for his advantage, and most dangerous to work our annoyance, let us look into these ensuing circumstances, and we shall the better judge where he will make his first descent.

Three things he will principally respect.

First, where he may find least resistance, and most quiet landing.

Secondly, where he may have best harbour for his galleys, and speediest supplies out of Spain, France and Flanders.

Thirdly, where he may most offend the realm by incursions, and force her Majesty, by keeping many garrisons, to stand upon a defensive war.

To the first, It carrieth no appearance in reason that he will land in any part of the realm where he shall not be able so soon to put himself on shore, and to intrench himself in strength, but ¹ that the whole body and force of that shire, with their neighbouring aids, may and will so disturb him, or prevent him with a battle, that he must either retire to his ships, or hazard his greatest forces and the overthrow of his wearied army; we being daily to be reinforced with fresh men and greater supplies; small strength being sufficient to keep them awaking and busied, until a strong head may be made against them.

To the second point, What place can be assigned that may stand indifferent for Spain, Flanders and France, but that they are too remote from the one and too near the other, except the Isle of Wight, Hampton or Portsmouth? To the latter two places, the precedent reason may give cause of security, which holdeth not in the first; but by all winds may be supplied out of one of the three countries before specified.

To the third, There is no doubt to be made, but landing in the Wight—which with an army of 8,000 men, divided into four parts, he may easily do, the force of the Island being unable to resist them with that force—in very short time they may so fortify themselves and possess those parts and places that lie convenient for passing over our supplies, and are by nature more than three parts fortified, that he may keep in safe harbour his galleys to make daily invasions into the firm¹ lands, where they shall perceive the standing of the wind will impeach her Majesty's ships to come to their rescue. So that all the castles and sea towns of Hampshire, Sussex and Dorsetshire will be subject to be burnt, unless her Majesty will keep garrisons in those places, the number and charge whereof will be no less exceeding² than how long they shall be forced to continue [will be] uncertain.

June 9.³—WALSYNGHAM TO HOWARD.

[ccxi. 8.—Copy. Endorsed. Nearly obliterated by damp.]

My very good Lord:—Her Majesty, perceiving by your Lordship's late letters to me that you were minded to repair to the Isles of Bayona, if the wind serve, there to abide the Spanish fleet or to discover what course they meant to take, doubting that in case your Lordship should put over so far the said fleet may take some other way, whereby they may escape your Lordship, as by bending their course westward to the altitude⁴ of 50 degrees, and then to shoot over to this realm, hath therefore willed me to let your Lordship understand that she thinketh it not convenient that your Lordship should go so far to the south as the said Isles of Bayona, but to ply up and down in some indifferent place between the coast of Spain and this realm, so as you may be able to answer any attempt that the said fleet shall make either against this realm, Ireland or Scotland. And so &c.

*June 9.—THOMAS BOSTOCKE TO SIR

[ccxi. 11.—Endorsed :—The copy of a letter written to Sir George Bond from St. John de Luz, the 19th of June, 1588.]

Jesus in St. John de Luz, the 19th of June, 1588.

Right Honourable, my duty considered &c. :—
It may please your Honour, my last I wrote per your son, William Bond, in the Black Dog, of whose arrival at Falmouth, in company with the Jane Bonaventure, we have understood by your son ; as also in my other letters I have wrote your Honour at large as concerning your affairs here ; and according to my request, I doubt not but that your Honour and my friend Mr. Howe will furnish me with a ship and commodities, as to your said son and to my letters I refer me² ; provided for the copper you send³ let it be all in squares and rounds, and to send me as little in bricks as possible you can.

I doubt not but that my friend here will accomplish⁴ with me for the woolls according to our concert,⁵ so that all my doubt is that any good shipping may not be suffered to come out of England ; for we hold it here for most certain that the Spanish army departed out of Lisbon of the 29th and 30th of the last ; and the report goeth that they be bound for our country of England, or else for some other place whereby to annoy her Majesty ; and they are 150 sails with men. I pray God of his mercy to prevent them of their purpose, and that we may have the victory of them ; which I doubt not, through the help of Almighty God, if her Majesty have intelligence of their coming.

Now if the Spanish army be arrived in her Majesty's dominions or other ways, to her Majesty's disliking, I pray your Honour to inform some of her Majesty's Council that here, in these parts, betwixt Fuenterrabia and the Groyne, there is preparing 50 or 60 sails of ships, small and great, and do lade only victuals for a new supply to refresh their foresaid army, as biscuit, cider, bacon and wines. If they could be met withal, but with six or eight good ships with their pinnaces, no doubt they would take them, although they come together¹ ; for they be most of them very small shipping. But I do think rather they will go in three or four fleets, because some of them will be assured to pass, as they report, to the north parts of Scotland, where they say their army is. And thus your Honour may partly guess in what order we remain, until it please God we hear of her Majesty's good proceeding against our enemy ; which God grant according to our heart's desire. And thus, doubting the conveyance will not be very speedy, I rest—praying God to prosper your Honour in all your proceedings with continuation of health.

Your Honour's servant,
THOMAS BOSTOCKE.

June 13.—HOWARD TO WALSYNGHAM.

[ccxi. 17.—Signed. Addressed. In bad condition.]

Sir :—I have received your letter by this bearer, of the 8th of this present, with two advertisements therein ; the one, out of France, of the demands that the Duke of Guise doth make and require of the King ; the other, of Scotland from my brother Carey,¹ which I most heartily thank you for ; but for the abstract that you write of, of the news sent you from Lisbon from the man that I know, that came not with your letter. Notwithstanding, I perceived by your letter that by all likelihood the King's fleet is come out ; that you doubt, by the number of Irishmen that [they have with] them, that they are like to come for Ireland.

Sir, if they [should do] so, or for Scotland, if all the world lay on it, we can do [no] good as this wind is ; for it holdeth here at West and South-West, and bloweth up so as that no ship here but her Majesty's great ships dare ride in this Sound, but are fain to go into the haven. If it begin to show any likelihood to be northerly or easterly, I do go out straight and all my company ; but we are not able by any means to get the weather² of this harbour, but fain to come in again, or else we should be driven to the leewards, either to Portland or to the Isle of Wight. I know not what weather you have there with you, but here is such weather as never was seen at this time of the year.

Sir, I protest before God I would I had not a foot of land in England, that the wind would serve us to be abroad ; and yet it is a hard matter and a thing impossible [for] us to lie in any place or to be anywhere to guard England, Ireland and Scotland ; and I would to God her Majesty had [thought] well for it that she had understood their plot, which w[ould] have been done easily for money. And then it would have been [an] easy matter to have made him¹ not able to have troubled [her] Majesty again in one seven years. And if the wind had been favourable unto us, we had been long since before their doors, [that] they should not have stirred but we would have been upon their jacks.² The wind hath continued so bad these 15 days, [that] we could by no means send any pinnace into the Trade.³ [God] will alter it when it shall please him.

Sir, if they h[ave] been at the sea so long as you are advertised, and as I [think] it most true⁴—for there were three hulks that stole out of Spain, and as they came along the coast, they saw the fleet off the Rock,⁵ a 12 or 15 [leagues distant]. That was on the 20th of May. It did confirm that which another ship did advertise before, and therefore very likely [to] be true. The fleet did bear, and ran off West and by North, which they did to get the westerly winds, and the best course that they could keep either for Ireland, Scotland, or England. And if they mean to go for Scotland [or] Ireland, they are there before this; and if I do hear of [it] I will not be long after them, if God will send us wind to do it.

But, Sir, I pray you see in what case we are. Our victuals are not yet come to us; and if this wind continue, God knoweth when it will come. The time of our victualling that we have doth come out¹ on Saturday next; but by the good means and wise and well doings of Mr. Darell,² we have been refreshed here with some 12 or 14 days' victual at times, or else it would have been hard to have put to the seas any time these ten days, with 15 or 16 days' victuals. But yet we were and are resolved to go whensoever the wind shall serve, and to be as near as we can where we may meet with the King's fleet, which I pray God to send us to do; for, Sir, since the world began, I think there was never a willinger company to do their prince service than these be.

² Marmaduke Darell, knighted in 1603, was at this time victualling agent for the navy, or Assistant-Surveyor, apparently subordinate to Quarles. He was formerly a clerk in the Queen's avery, or stables, and in 1585 was appointed by the Council to attend upon Sir Amyas Poulet, 'and to have the defraying of all such sums of money as should concern the diet, charges and expenses of the Scottish Queen'—Accounts relating to Mary, Queen of Scots (Camden Soc.), p. 1. In February 1587 he was still at Fotheringay, where he witnessed the execution of the Queen of Scots, as he wrote to his cousin, William Darrell of Littlecote— a very different man in sober history from the Wold Darrell of poetry and tradition. Cf. Rokby, v. 36, and Hall's Elizabethan Society, passim.

Sir, if you can by any means learn, or if we can, that they be in the Groyne, I doubt not but by God's grace we will make sport with them. If you hear that they be landed in Ireland or Scotland, I pray you let me have word with all possible speed. If the wind hold here you must send hither; if it change we are gone. Sir, I will never go again to such a place of service but I will carry my victuals with me, and not trust to careless men behind me. We came away scarce with a month's victuals; it had been little enough but to have gone to Flushing. We think it should be marvelled at how we keep our men from running away, for the worst men in the fleet knoweth for how long they are victualled; but I thank God as yet we are not troubled with any mutinies, nor I hope shall not; for I see men kindly handled will bear want and run through the fire and water; and I doubt not but if this month's victual come unto us from London before we depart, we will make it to serve us to continue very near three months. And if it does not come, yet assure yourself we will not lose any opportunity, nor we will not lack; there is good fishing in the seas. And if we be driven upon any occasion upon the coast of Spain, I durst meet with the King of Spain's 18,000 men on the land in any reasonable place; and therefore, fear not, we will not want. God send us wind. And if the wind had favoured us when we went out from hence, which was on the 29th of May, they should not have needed to have come thus far to have sought us.

Sir, I forbear to write unto my Lord Treasurer, because I am sure he is a very heavy man¹ for my Lady his daughter,² which I am most heartily sorry for. And so I bid you most heartily farewell. From aboard her Majesty's good ship the Ark, the 13th of June, 1588.

Your loving friend,
C. HOWARD.

[ccxiii. 88.—Signed. A small slip of paper, without date, address, or endorsement. Probably a postscript to the preceding. It is in the same writing, on the same paper, and has suffered from the same bad usage.]

Sir :—Most of the ships do presently come out of their victuals, which Mr. Darell will presently supply, and the rest he cannot possibly victual as yet ; which, because they be better provided,¹ shall stay until he can provide for them, which will be within these 30 days at the farthest.

Sir, I pray you send to the committee of London for to send down hither some money for the relief of their soldiers and mariners, who have done their duties hitherunto very well.

Sir, You would not believe what a wonderful thing it is to victual such an army as this is in such a narrow corner of the realm, where a man would think that neither victuals were to be had, nor cask to put it in, which I believe is little thought on there.

C. HOWARD.

June 14. - HOWARD TO WALSYNGHAM.

[ccxi. 18.—Signed. Addressed. In bad condition.]

Sir :—The extremity of the weather in this place where it hath [held], hath caused me to continue here longer than I had meant. I have not marvelled a little, continuing here so long, that I have not heard how the proceedings in the Low Countries have gone; for in my opinion it had been very necessary, that I might have carried myself thereafter in the actions.¹ For if the weather had served me to have gone out, or whensoever it shall serve, I will do my best endeavour to learn where the fleet is, and afterwards to find them out; and according as either I shall hear from you or find by them, thereafter to deal with them.

The opinion of Sir Francis Drake, Mr. Hawkins, Mr. Frobiser, and others that be men of greatest judgment [and] experience, as also my own concurring with them in the same, is that [the] surest way to meet with the Spanish fleet is upon their own [coast], or in any harbour of their own, and there to defeat them; for if [they have] been so long at the sea as the advertisements do declare, they must [now] be landed either in Ireland or Scotland ere this, or else somewhere [on] the coast of France. But I [am] verily persuaded they mean [nothing] else but to linger it out upon their own coast, until they understand [that] we have spent our victuals here; and therefore we must be busy [with] them before we suffer ourselves to be brought to that extremity.

Sir, it is very strange that, in this time, the Commissioners cannot perceive whether they mean a peace without fraud, or use the same² to detract a time for a further device. And if our Commissioners do discover any detraction in them, only to serve their own turns, methinks her Majesty should use the like policy, and devise to beat them with their own rod. Then could I wish with all my heart that King Anthony¹ were with us, that he might set foot in his own country, and find the King occupied² there, which we might easily do. Thus I do adventure to [offer] my mind privately unto you, as unto my especial good friend, pray[ing you that] I may hear from you speedily again of such proceedings as the Commissioners have, of such advertisements as you hear, and privately, of your own advice and judgment herein.

¹ In my actions; have guided my conduct thereby.

Sir, we have endured these three days, Wednesday, Thursday and Friday, an extreme continual storm. Myself, and four or five of the greatest ships, have ridden it out in the Sound, because we had no room in Catwater, for the lesser ships that were there; nor betwixt the shore and the Island,³ because Sir Francis Drake, with four or five other ships, did ride there. Myself and my company in these ships do continually tarry and lie aboard in all the storm, where we may compare that we have danced as lustily as the gallantest dancers in the Court. And if it may please God to continue her Majesty's ships as strong to the end of the journey as they have done hitherto, her Majesty may [be su]re (what false and villainous reports soever have been made of them) [she hath] the strongest ships that any prince [in] Christendom hath. A[nd all the] masters and skilful men here say that it had been better to have [been of] late in any of the Spanish seas, than to have ridden out these storms here, wherein we do not find that any one ship complains.

Sir, our victuals be not come yet unto us; and if this weather hold, I know not when they will come.

³ St. Nicholas or Drake's Island.

Sir, I must not omit to let you know how lovingly and kindly Sir Francis Drake beareth himself; and also how dutifully to her Majesty's service and unto me, being in the place I am in; which I pray you he may receive thanks for, by some private letter from you.

And so, praying you to present my most bounden and humble duty unto her Majesty, and that I will not trouble her with my letters before some matter of greater moment do fall out, I bid you heartily farewell. From off aboard her Majesty's good ship the Ark, in Plymouth Sound, the 14th of June, 1588.

Your assured loving friend,

C. HOWARD.

June 15.—HOWARD TO WALSYNGHAM.

[ccxi. 28.—Signed. Addressed.]

Sir :—Within three hours after I had written my letter, which herewith I send you, [I] received your letter of the 9th of this present¹ by a pursuivant. Which letter I do not a little marvel at; for thereby you signify that her Majesty, perceiving by a letter I sent you heretofore, that I was minded to go on the coast of Spain, to the Isles of Bayona, her pleasure is that I should not go so far, but only off and on, betwixt the coast of Spain and England; lest the Spanish fleet should come into the height² of 50, and then should bend their course directly to this realm.

Sir, for the meaning we had to go on the coast of Spain, it was deeply debated by those which I think [the] world doth judge to be men of greatest experience that this realm hath; which are these:

Sir Francis Drake, Mr. Hawkyns, Mr. Frobiser, and Mr. Thomas Fenner ; and I hope her Majesty will not think that we went so rashly to work, or without a principal and choice care and respect of the safety of this realm. We would go on the coast of Spain ; and therefore our ground was first, to look to that principal¹ ; and if we found they did but linger on their own coast, or that they were put into the Isles of Bayona or the Groyne, then we thought in all men's judgments that be of experience here, it had been most fit to have sought some good way, and the surest we could devise, by the good protection of God, to have defeated them.

[For] this, we considered that the Spanish forces, being for so long [time] victualled as they are, might in very good policy detract [time, to] drive us to consume our victuals, which, for anything we [can see], is not to be supplied again to serve the turn, by all the means that her Majesty and all you can do. And if her Majesty do think that she is able to detract time with the King of Spain, she is greatly deceived ; which may breed her great peril. For this abusing [of] the treaty of peace doth plainly show how the King of Spain will have all things perfect, [as] his plot is laid, before he will proceed to execute. I am persuaded he will see the Duke of Guise bring the French [King] to his purpose before he will [act]. If his intention be so, I pray you, when our victuals be consumed in gazing for them, what shall become of us ? Whether this [may] not breed most great danger and dishonour, I leave it to her Majesty's wisdom ; but if it should fall out so, I would I had never been born ; and so I am sure many here would wish no less, [on] their own behalf.

And if [we] were to-morrow next on the coast of Spain, I would not land in any place to offend any ; but they should well perceive that we came not to spoil, but to seek out the great force to fight with them ; and so should they have known by message ; which should have been the surest [way] and most honourable to her Majesty. But now, as by your directions to lie off and on betwixt England and Spain, the South-West wind, that shall bring them to Scotland or Ireland, shall put us to the leeward. The seas are broad ; but if we had been [on] their coast, they durst not have put off, to have left us [on] their backs ; and when they shall come with the south-westerly wind, which must serve them if they go for Ireland or Scotland, though we be as high as Cape Clear, yet shall we not be able to go to them as long as the wind shall be westerly. And if we lie so high, then may the Spanish fleet bear with the coast of France, to come for the Isle of Wight ; which for my part, I think, if they come to England, they will attempt. Then are we clean out of the way of any service against them.

But I must and will obey ; and am glad there be such there, as are able to judge what is fitter for us to do, than we here¹ ; but by my instructions which I had, I did think it otherwise. But I will put them up in a bag, and I shall most humbly pray her Majesty to think that that which we meant to do was not rashly determined, and that which shall be done shall be most carefully used by us ; and we will follow and obey her Majesty's commandment. But if we had been now betwixt Spain and England, we had been but in hard case, the storm being so strong and continuing so long as it hath done ; but upon the coast of Spain, we had had a land wind and places of succour. We meant not to have spoiled any town or village ; only we must of necessity water ; and when we lie betwixt both coasts, we must come to this coast to water, for so we are enjoined ; and if the wind do not serve us to come on our own coast, then in what case shall [we be, now] that we must not go on the coast of Spain ? We lay seven days in the Sleeve, which was as long as we could continue there without danger, as the wind was ; and if some had been with us, they should have seen what a place of danger it is to lie on and off in.

Sir, you know it [hath] been the opinion both of her Majesty and others, that it was [the sur]jest course to lie on the coast of Spain. I confess my error at that time, which¹ was otherwise ; but I did and will yield ever unto them of greater experience. Yet you know it was thought by her Majesty that we might go into Lisbon to defeat them, which was the strongest place. Therefore I thought that if we had heard that they had been at the Isles of Bayona, or the Groyne, which be ten times more easy to defeat them in, I think it would have been good service.

But, Sir, I will persuade no [more], but do as I am directed ; and God send the wind do not force us thither ; otherwise, upon my duty, we will not go thither, now we know her Majesty's pleasure. And so I bid you most heartily farewell. From aboard her Majesty's good ship the Ark, in Plymouth Sound, the 15th of June, 1588.

Your assured loving friend,
C. HOWARD.

June 17.—SEYMOUR TO WALSYNGHAM.

[ccxi. 33.—Holograph. Addressed.]

Sir :—So long as I am in this action of service, [at] such times as will give me leave to consider advisedly thereof, [I] do bethink myself thereafter, by delivering my opinion touching the effect of your letter to Sir William Wynter, wherewith you wished me to be acquainted ; and so much the rather I busy my head, because yesterday hasty news flew from Calais to Dover of the Spanish fleet¹ being at Ushant.

But touching the Duke of Parma his intent for the annoyance of England, I am fully resolved² his enterprises will never go forward, but where beforehand he doth assure himself of a strong party of the contrary side ; which for England, God himself (I hope) doth prevent, as otherwise assisteth your Honours all with his Spirit, by restraining the papists' governments through every several shire,³ whereby the same is avoided by that course.

And were it so that he might have a faction in England, surely those places remembered by Sir William Wynter are very likely to be attempted ; but yet I have bethought myself of a far more convenient hold, most fit above any yet set down, the Isle of Wight by name, aptest for a rendezvous.

And where Sir William Wynter doubteth the main chance for London by the Thames mouth,

adding his opinion for sconces and bulwarks, thereby to front the enemies, the charge growing thereof can not be but great; besides, the weakness of those places shall be thoroughly discovered, where now, for the most part, the same are concealed. For remedying whereof with a far less charge, twenty such hoys as Harwich and Ipswich do set forth, lying in the Thames mouth in several places, being nimble of sail and quick in turning to and fro, will prevent and greatly withstand any sudden attempt; and I am sure these twenty sails will be defrayed under the rate of four such ships as the Rainbow.

But to proceed with the Duke of Parma. We suspect, and I fear we shall find his great faction with the Duke of Guise, by reason of the Holy League. And where most commonly he giveth forth his determinations, the same for the most part doth fall out contrary; as by the last year's experience, he made show for Ostend, and yet went to Sluys. So likewise now, he would busy our heads sometimes for Scotland, at other times for Ireland, otherwise for Norfolk or Suffolk, the more to blind our eyes by bending our forces those ways, and taking his further advantages, for his inward conceits; the same, no doubt, being resolutely determined for Holland and Zealand, or for Picardy; in which both places he presumeth to have strong factions.

To prevent all which, in time, is¹ to call home our Commissioners, if you stand doubtful of your expectations for their proceedings. With all, her Majesty shall ease her purse, by giving general liberty to make open wars. Otherwise, in prolonging these actions with such charges, gaining a peace fit for heretics, her Majesty, whom I beseech God long preserve, will be in danger both of the foreign enemies, as otherwise stand in great contempt among her subjects, who do now manifest their duties and good wills apparently.

Thus referring my opinion to better judgments, and desiring to be excused for intermeddling so far, with my most loving commendations, I betake¹ you to God. From aboard the Rainbow, the 17th of June, 1588.

Your assured friend to command,

H. SEYMOUR.

Post.—Sir, I would be glad you would procure her Majesty or my Lords to send the letters for these hoys; but rather I wish you would send me word to take order to send them to Greenwich, where they may be seen before her Majesty remove from thence; and I am sure my opinion will be confirmed among you. They may be better spared now. Their victuals do expire within eight days.

June 19.—HOWARD TO WALSYNGHAM.

[ccxi. 37.—Holograph. Addressed.]

Good Mr. Secretary :—You see it is very likely to come to pass, my opinion that I always had of the French King; as also of the treacherous treaty of peace, which was never to any other end but that the King of Spain might have time, and not be troubled in gathering his forces together, and her Majesty's noble and princely nature most greatly abused. And therefore, good Mr. Secretary, let every one of you persuade her Majesty that she lose no more time in taking care enough of herself, and to make herself, every way that is possible, as strong as she can; for there is no question but the

King of Spain hath engaged his honour to the uttermost in this, for the overthrow of her Majesty and this realm, and doth employ all the forces, not only of his own, but also all that he can get of his friends, for this exploit; and if he be put back from this this year, her Majesty may have a good and honourable peace. If not, yet she shall be sure he shall not be able to trouble her Majesty in many years after.

You see it is made in the world greatly for his honour that he is able to make such a power as that he will enterprise to invade England. Thanks be to God, the world shall also see that her Majesty hath provided sufficient forces to beat him by sea; so would I wish that in time¹ her Majesty should gather some great force together for her defence on the land. It would be a great surety, and to the world most honourable. For if it come that her [Majesty] should draw the forces together on the sudden, it will breed a marvellous confusion²; and all sudden causes breeds many doubts in multitudes. I hope in God the manifest discovery of their determination, as it may well happen by the arch-traitor Allen's book,³ will awaken all men. If there be that will not awake with this, I would to God when they are asleep they might never awake.

² The sense is: But if her Majesty should neglect to do so, and afterwards have to gather her forces together in a hurry, on a sudden emergency, it will cause much confusion.

³ William Allen, born at Rossall in 1532, was in Queen Mary's time Principal of St. Mary's Hall, Oxford. He resigned this office in 1560, and quitted England in 1561. He became a priest in 1565, and in 1568 founded the English college at Douay, where, in 1570, he was appointed Professor of Divinity. In 1582 he threw himself warmly into the polemical politics of the day, and was mixed up in the schemes of the Guises and in the plots in favour of the Queen of Scots. After her death he publicly asserted the title of the King of Spain to the throne of England, and—having been made a cardinal in 1587—published, in 1588, a violent and offensive pamphlet, entitled, 'An Admonition to the Nobility and People of England and Ireland concerning the

Sir, because in service of so great moment as this is, it were not requisite that many should be privy of our counsels, I made choice of these whose names I here write, to be councillors of this service; made them all to be sworn to be secret:—Sir F. Drake, Lord Thomas Howard, the Lord Sheffield, Sir Roger Williams,¹ Mr. Hawkyns, Mr. Frobiser, Mr. Thomas Fenner. I chose Sir Roger Williams for his experience by land, what occasion soever might fall out to land in Ireland, or Scotland, or in England; for God willing, if it please God to send us wind to serve us, we mean to land some with them wheresoever they land in any of her Majesty's dominions. I do assure you, Sir, these two noblemen² be most gallant gentlemen, and not only for-present wars, made for the execution of his Holiness' sentence by the high and mighty King Catholic of Spain.' It is to this that Howard here refers. It has been suggested that the violence of the style and the brutality of the matter are altogether alien to Allen's nature, and that he could not have been the real author. This is possible; but he acknowledged it, gave it the weight of his reputation as a man of piety, learning and rank, and must bear the odium which attaches to its publication. He died at Rome in 1594.

² Lord Thomas Howard, born in 1561, second son of the 4th Duke of Norfolk, was at this time captain of the Golden Lion, and was knighted on July 25. In 1591 he commanded the fleet at the Azores, when Sir Richard Greynville was slain and the wards, but very discreet in all their doings. I would to God I could say for her Majesty's service, that there were four such young noblemen behind to serve her. God bless them with life, and they will be able to do her Majesty and the realm good service.

Sir, I am glad that the ships sent out by the towns are victualled for a month more. I would it were two. And for the love of God, let not her Majesty care now for charges, so as it be well used. And strengthen my Lord Harry in the Narrow Seas with as much force as you can, sike¹ by force of the sea to keep any from landing; for landing will breed, I am afraid, great danger.

Sir, I pray send to us with all speed. But I hope to be gone before I hear from you, for I will not tarry one hour after our victuals do come to us, and if the wind will serve us; for there must be no time lost now, and we must seek to cut off their time, which I hope in God to do.

Sir, as I have ever found you to be my most especial good friend, and the man that, for your honourable and faithful doings ever with me, hath made me to think myself ever greatly beholden unto you, I therefore now do most earnestly pray you to stand my good friend, as to move her Majesty this my humble suit and request: that if it please God

Revenge captured; and in 1596 took part in the expedition against Cadiz. He was created Earl of Suffolk in 1603; was Lord High Treasurer 1614-19; and died in 1626. Edmund Sheffield, born in 1563, succeeded as 3rd Baron Sheffield in 1568. His mother was Howard's sister, at this time the wife of Sir Edward Stafford. He was now in command of the White Bear, and was also knighted by Howard on July 25. He was created Earl of Mulgrave in 1626, and died in 1646. Portraits of both are given in Doyle's Baronage.

to call me to him in this service of her Majesty, which I am most willing to spend my life in, that her Majesty of her goodness will bestow my boy upon my poor wife.¹ And if it please her Majesty to let my poor wife have the keeping either of Hampton Court or Oatlands,² I shall think myself more bound to her Majesty. For I do assure you, Sir, I shall not leave her so well as so good a wife doth deserve.

Thus, Sir, I have been bold to trouble you, and can yield you no other requital but my love and good will as long as I live ; and so I recommend me most heartily unto you, and bid you farewell. [From] aboard the Ark, the 19th of June.

C. HOWARD.

June 20.—WYNTER TO WALSYNGHAM.

[ccxi. 38.—Signed. Addressed.]

I do most humbly thank your Honour for your letters I received yesterday in the evening, bearing date the 18th of this present, whereby it appeareth that my letters lately written to your Honour, in answer of yours, had favourable construction, both by her Majesty, yourself, and all my very good Lords of the Council, which doth glad me greatly, and I, as becometh me in duty, by God's favour, will ever acknowledge your honourable kindness used therein towards me, as also for many other your favours.

² In Surrey. The park is now broken up and built over, and a big hotel stands on the site of the old palace.

It seemeth by your Honour's letters that the Prince of Parma his intention is towards Sheppey, Harwich, or Yarmouth ; two of the which I know perfectly, as Sheppey and Harwich ; the other not so well. And yet, if I do not mistake the situation of the said places, they are such as a small charge (in manner of speaking) will make a sufficient strength to withstand any sudden attempt. And whereas it is said the Prince's strength is 30,000 soldiers, then I assure your Honour it is no mean quantity of shipping that must serve for the transporting of that number and that which doth appertain to them, without the which I do not think they will put forth ; 300 sail must be the least ; and, one with another, to be counted 60 ton. For I well remember that in the journey made to Scotland, in the Queen's Majesty's father's time, when we burned Leith and Edinburgh,¹ and there was in that expedition 260 sail of ships ; and yet we were not able to land above 11,000 men, and we then in fear of none that could impeach us by sea. It may be said the cut² between Flanders and the places named is shorter than out of England to the Frith in Scotland, which is true ; but, Sir, men that do come for such a purpose, being so huge an army as 30,000 men, must have a mighty deal of all sorts of provisions to serve them, as your honourable wisdom can well consider.

But, Sir, I take the Prince's case to be far otherwise. For I suppose, if the countries of Holland and Zealand did arm³ forth but only the shipping which the Lord Admiral at his departing delivered unto our admiral in writing that they would send from those parts to join with us here, and that was 36 sail of ships of war, and that it were known to the Prince those did nothing but remain in readiness to go to the seas for the impeaching of his fleet whensoever they did come forth, I should live until I were young again or¹ the Prince would venture to set his ships forth.

And again, if her Majesty's ships, and such others as doth but now remain under our admiral's charge, may be continued in the state we are in, and not to be separated, the Prince's forces, being no other than that which he hath in Flanders at this time (upon whom we mean to keep as good watch for their coming forth as possible we can), dare not come to the seas. But the sorrow we have is that we think these dealings of his to be rather a scarecrow, to hasten or bring to pass such an end of the treaty as may be most for his master's advantage, than that he meaneth to set forward the thing he giveth out in show.

Your honourable opinion that 1,000 footmen and 200 horsemen might² be assigned to each of the three several places before rehearsed, to make head upon any attempt, and to remain until it be seen what the Prince's designs may be, is in my poor conceit very good. For in these princely actions, a man cannot be too provident; and no wisdom were it to put things to an even³ balance, when more weight may be added.

There was news sent over from Calais of late to Dover, by one Skofield,⁴ an English merchant lying there (as it is said), that there arrived at Dunkirk lately certain Brittany ships, whose mariners should⁵ give out that they came in company from Cape Finisterre with 150 ships of war of the King of Spain's; and how that they parted from them upon the coast of Brittany near the Trade.¹ Since which time we have had perfect intelligence that the Queen's Majesty's ship, the Elizabeth Bonaventure, hath been within the Trade and thereabouts. Likewise we have spoken with the masters and company of three flyboats of Hoorn and Enkhuysen,² that were in Rochelle five days past, and came along all the coast of Brittany, and through the Trade; and they said there was none upon that coast. Further, they declared to us that there was a report at Rochelle, seven days before their departing, that part of the Spanish army, to the number of 150 sail, were come to the Groyne, and stayed there for the rest which should come from Lisbon to them. But afterwards there was certain news brought thither by ships of Rochelle, men of war that came home and brought very good prizes of Spaniards with them, that the army remained still in Lisbon, and the infection continued very great among them. It is a bad season of the year for any ships that are in Lisbon, and to the southwards of it upon the coast of Spain, to come to the northwards, by reason of the north and north-westerly wind that bloweth commonly from the middle of May until the latter end of August upon that coast; after which time it will not be wholesome for a Spanish army to seek to the north part.

The men of the foresaid three flyboats informed us that the King of Navarre was in Rochelle; and that they were in hand with a great fortification without the town, whereupon daily, men, women, and children did work, and the King himself. They spake it as witness of sight.

We are informed that my Lord Admiral is at Plymouth with his whole army, which is but a bad place for my Lord to be in, if the King of Spain's navy should come. For that wind which would serve to bring them for England, Ireland, or Scotland, will not suffer my Lord to get out; and the country is not very good to yield them that relief of victual that they may need of. The ships that lately went with their provision of victuals from London are with them, or else very near by this.

If we cannot have a good peace by the treaty now in hand, and that shortly, which I wish for my part might be, then if her Majesty, with the Low Countries, as Holland and Zealand, did make a sharp war out of hand (entertaining Scotland as our friend), and to spare the pride of our backs and some of our gluttons' fare, I do not doubt (by God's grace) we should then make her Majesty's enemies to come to reason shortly; and if this be not done, I fear me it cannot do well; for that we shall be wearied out with charges. And that I take to be their only policy they have; into the which I know your wisdom can sound deep, and therefore I leave it to your honourable discretion, and humbly pray your Honour to bear with my boldness.

If Mr. Hawkyns hath not left your Honour, or my very good Lord, the Lord Treasurer, the book of the issuing out of the store¹ of the storehouses, to the end your Honours may know what the same is, as² a supply may be made, he hath not well remembered himself; for it is needful there were a care had of it in time; for the year will now slide away apace.

If it will please your Honour to cause some one of your good friends hereabouts near the seaside to bestow a buck upon me and Sir Henry Palmer,³ your poor well-willers, we should think ourselves

June 22.—HOWARD TO THE COUNCIL.

[ccxi. 45.—Signed. Addressed. In bad condition.]

May it please your Lordships, I have received your Lordships' letters of the 17th this morning, being the 22nd of this instant, whereby I do perceive her Majesty's gracious goodness that she thinketh us to be so careful of her s[ervice] as that she hath referred it unto me and such other my assistants here to do that which I and they shall think fittest and most convenient to be done for the more surety and service of her Majesty and [the] state. And her Majesty shall be well assured, and your Lordships also, as it shall please God that wind and weather shall serve us, we will [take such] course that we may learn by all intelligence to find the [enemy], yet not so rashly to deal with them if we meet with the[m but that] her Majesty shall well perceive that it is done with judgment. And yet [ho]wsoever we shall do it by the wisdom and [discretion] of man, yet God is he which disposeth all, who I doubt not [will favour] her Majesty and his people, and send her a most honourable victory.

I pray your Lordships to pardon me that I may put you in remembrance [to] move her Majesty that she may have an especial care to draw [ten or] twelve thousand men about her own person, that may not be men [un]practised. For this she may well assure herself, that 10,000 men that be practised and trained together under a good governor [and] expert leaders, shall do her Majesty more service than any 40,000 which shall come from any other parts of the realm. For, my Lords, we have here 6,000 men in the fleet, which we shall be able, out of our company, to land upon any great occasion, which being as they [have] been trained here under captains and men of experience, and each man knowing his charge, and they their captains, I had rather have them to do any exploit than any 16,000 out of any part of the realm.

My Lords, our victuals are not yet come, but we hope shortly to hear of them if this wind continue 40 hours, or else we cannot tell what to think of them, or what should become of them; and yet we have sent three or four pinnaces to seek them out. If they come not, our extremity will be very great, for our victuals ended the 15th of this month; and if that Mr. Darell had not very carefully provided us of 14 days' victuals, and again with four or five days' more, which now he hath provided, we had been in some great extremity. Mr. Hawkyns hath disbursed money for all that, and for many other charges more, wherein Sir Francis Drake hath likewise disbursed some; and therefore to avoid that danger and inconvenience that may fall out thereby, it would do very well that her Majesty would send five or six thousand pounds hither, for it is likely we shall stand in great need of it.

[Several] men have fallen sick, and by thousands fain to be discharged, [and] other pressed in their stead, which hath been an infinite charge [with] great trouble unto us, the army being so great as it is, the ships so many in number, and the weather so ext[reme] foul as it hath been; whereby great charges have risen and daily do. And yet I protest before God we have been more careful of her Majesty's charges than of our own lives, as may well appear by the scantyings¹ which we have made. And thus leaving to trouble your Lordships any further, I take my leave. From off aboard her Majesty's good ship the Ark, the 22nd of June, 1588.

Your Lordships' loving friend to command,
C. HOWARD.

June 22.—HOWARD TO WALSYNGHAM.

[ccxi. 46.—Holograph. Addressed.]

Sir :—I am very sorry that her Majesty will not thoroughly awake in this perilous and most dangerous time ; and surely it will touch her Majesty greatly in honour if the noblemen and the rest of the Commissioners should not safely come back again. It is to me a strange treaty of peace, but the end is like unto the beginning. There is not anything that ever cometh to a good end that hath not a good and sure foundation, which I could never discern in this work of Mr. Comptroller's.² A good will I think he had, but surely no good workman.

For the advertisement of the Bretons that came to Calais,³ I think it cannot be true, for we have had pinnaces off and on, so as we should by some means have heard of it, but I will send presently some small pinnaces thither.

² Sir James Croft, Comptroller of the Household, and one of the commissioners for the treaty.

³ Cf. ante, p. 206. It appears to have been his first news of the Spanish ships reported by Godolphin, as detailed in the next paper.

I put out on Wednesday to the sea in hopes to have met with our victuallers, but on Friday we were put in again with a southerly wind. I hope now shortly we shall hear of our victuals, for the wind doth now serve them. I pray God all be well with them, for if any chance should come to [them], we should be in most miserable case. For the love of God, let the Narrow Seas be well strengthened, and the ships victualled¹ for some good time. This one month's victual is very ill, and may breed danger and no saving to her [Majesty]; for they spend lightly seven or eight days in coming to meet their victual and in taking of it in; and if the enemy do know of that time, judge you what they may attempt. Great hurt may come by it, but no good.

Sir, I pray let her Majesty be earnestly persuaded withal to have some forces of ten or twelve thousand soldiers near to her, that may know one another and their leaders. I had rather have ten thousand such, well trained and kept together, than forty thousand that shall be brought on the sudden, half amazed, as her Majesty shall be sure to find them. Her Majesty must assure herself she is not now in peace; and therefore most priceless service, and most to her honour, to provide as in war.

Sir, I pray you to present my most bound and humble duty to her Majesty; so, God willing, I will not trouble her Majesty with my rude writing till the matter be something worth. God, of his mercy, bless her Majesty with health and to have honour over her enemies. Fare you well, good Mr. Secretary, and God send you health. From aboard the Ark, the 22nd of this June.

Your assured loving friend,
C. HOWARD.

June 23.—ADVERTISEMENT OF THE SPANISH FLEET.

[ccxi. 47, 48.—In duplicate, with some verbal differences.
Endorsed :—From the Lord Admiral.]

On Friday last, the 20th¹ of this instant, Sir Francis Godolphin² wrote unto my Lord Admiral, that the Thursday before, a bark of Mousehole³ in Cornwall, being bound for France to lade salt, encountered with nine sail of great ships between Scilly and Ushant, bearing in North-East with the coast of England. Coming near unto them, he, doubting they were Spaniards, kept the wind of them. They perceiving it, began to give him chase. So in the end, three of them followed him so near that the Englishman doubted hardly to escape them.

At his first sight of them there were two flags spread which were suddenly taken in again, and being far off could not well discern the same. They were all great ships, and, as he might judge, the least of them from 200 tons to 5 and 800 tons. Their sails were all crossed over with a red cross. Each of the greater ships towed astern them either a great boat or pinnace without mast.

The same morning, or the evening before, the Englishman had speech with a flyboat, who demanding of the Englishman whither he was bound, told him for France to lade salt. He willed him in any wise, as he loved his life, not to proceed; for, said he, the Spanish fleet is on the coast. He further told him that he had spoken with some of his countrymen that had been two years with their ships imbarged¹ in Spain, and were there come in the fleet. The Englishman, little regarding his speeches, or at least to see the farther truth thereof, proceeded, and found some more likelihood of the same, as is before said.

On Saturday, there came another Englishman from the west part of Cornwall, who likewise had been chased with² a fleet of ships, being shot at by them, but recovered the shore with little hurt.

On Sunday, one Simons of Exeter gave advertisement to my Lord Admiral that on Friday last he was chased with a fleet of great ships, having some of his men hurt with shot from them; escaping their hands, landed in Cornwall, and came post to Plymouth unto my Lord Admiral.

Each of their ships have red crosses on their sails. The two latter fleets which were discovered were, in the one, six sail, and in the other, fifteen sail.

[ccxi. 49.—Signed. Addressed.]

Sir :—I can advertise you but little since my last writing more than I have been at Gravelines some thirty hours, during which time issued forth from Dunkirk two small vessels, bending their course to Gravelines haven. Two of our pinnaces chased them, with the discharging of some saker shot, and yet would [they] not strike, till at the last one of our shot strake down the mainmast of one of their vessels, being a French bottom belonging to Calais, and had Monsieur Gourdan's³ hand for his pass.

I demanded what he meant not to strike his sails and to come to the Queen's ships, knowing us so well. He answered that he took us for the King of Navarre's fleet, making himself ignorant what to do. I replied that if the Duke of Parma, or the Duke of Guise, should do the like, I would sink them, or they should distress me; adding further that my Sovereign Lady was able to defend her country against the Holy League, besides able to master any civil discord; and so dismissed them, with some little choler.¹

The other ran himself hard aground right over against Gravelines, and voided themselves out of their vessel, wading through the water, and cut their sails from the masts, taking them also away. My boat, which I manned with some shot,² came upon their skirts, but a little too late; yet came there very near a hundred men, horse and foot, but durst not approach our shot³; by which time our men had some little leisure to cut down their masts, and would have fired her, but that suddenly the wind arose at North and by East, enforcing us to weigh for Blackness, where we anchored, with marvellous foul weather, some thirty hours.

These actions befell yesterday, the 22nd of this month, so as now the wind is come three points more, being North-North-East,³ and thereby enforced to take our best harbours upon our own coasts; yet in the passage, far from us, we did descry 30 sail, to our judgment Hollanders, taking their courses westwards, which I would gladly have pursued, but that I feared they would have brought us too far west, being⁴ not able to recover those coasts which we are to look unto.

Sir :—I have strained my hand with hauling of a rope, whereby as yet I cannot write so much as I would, and therefore am enforced to use the manner to dictate.

There are ten days expired of this last victuals, and when ten days more are spent, eight days will be little enough to come home and take in our victuals ; and the service that is to be done is most likely at the time of our revictualling, which I have often desired should be at the least for six weeks.

Sir, it is more than time our coast men were victualled, which was promised by your last letters should be forthwith supplied.

June 23.—HOWARD TO THE QUEEN.

[ccxi. 50.—Holograph.]

To the Queen's most excellent Majesty.

May it please your most excellent Majesty :—I have forborne this long time to write unto your Majesty, hoping that the wind would have served that on this I might have certified your Majesty of something worth the writing. We have often put to the sea, and have been fain to run off and on the Sleeve² with contrary winds ; and in the end, not being able to continue out for fear of being driven to the leeward as far as the Wight, were forced in again, into Plymouth. Our victuals were spent, and the wind not serving our victuals to come to us, we expected the goodness of God to change the wind, which did happily change on Friday morning, so that on Saturday, late at night, they came to us. They were no sooner come, although it were night, but we went all to work to get in our victuals,¹ which I hope shall be done in 24 hours, for no man shall sleep² nor eat till it be dispatched; so that, God willing, we will be under sail to-morrow morning, being Monday, and the 24th of this present. I humbly beseech your Majesty to think that there was never men more unwilling to lose any time than we are.

Even as I had written this much of my letter to your Majesty, I received this letter³ from a man of mine, which I did send to lie with a pinnace betwixt the Land's End and Ushant.⁴ The party himself⁵ that was chased did bring the letter, who is a wise man and of good credit. There was also another ship in this man's company that was also chased with him. The ships they met withal, seven of them, were ships of eight and nine hundred.⁶ The others were Biscayans of 300. It is very likely that this stormy weather hath parted the fleet.⁷ I hope in God we shall meet with some of them; we will not stay for anything. I trust we shall meet with them on the coast of France, for I have some intelligence that for certain they mean to come thither, and there to receive many Frenchmen into their ships.

For the love of Jesus Christ, Madam, awake thoroughly, and see the villainous⁸ treasons round about you, against your Majesty and your realm, and

I humbly beg your Majesty to pardon me that I do cut off my letter in this sort. I am now in haste, and long to set sail. I beseech the Almighty God to bless and defend your Majesty from all your enemies, and so I do most humbly take my leave. From aboard the Ark, ready to weigh, this Sunday night at 12 of the clock.

June 23.—HOWARD TO WALSYNGHAM.

Sir :—This Sunday, about 7 of the clock at night, I received your letter of the 22nd of this present, and the advertisements with them, which I do most heartily thank you for ; but I perceive by your letter there should another letter come from my Lords to Mr. Darell, and also a warrant that the pursuivant should bring, which should be open for me, but he neither brought the Lords' letter nor any such warrant.

Sir, I pray you pardon me that I do not send you the names of the towns divided, such as be willing, and such as be not. Sir F. Drake hath the names of them. Now at this hour [he] is full occupied, as I am also. Our victuals came to us this last night about 12 of the clock, and we will not eat nor sleep till it be aboard us. We must not lose one hour of time. You shall see by a letter that I have sent her Majesty what advertisement I have. I mean to weigh presently and set sail. This foul weather that was on Thursday, that forced us in, surely dispersed the Spanish fleet. It shall go hard but I will find them out. Let her Majesty trust no more to Judas' kisses ; for let her assure herself there is no trust to French King nor Duke of Parma. Let her defend herself like a noble and mighty prince, and trust to her sword and not to their word, and then she need not fear, for her good God will defend her.

Sir, I have a privy intelligence by a sure fellow that this fleet of Spain doth mean to come to the coast of France, and there to receive in the Duke of Guise and great forces ; and it is very likely to be true. I mean, God willing, to visit the coast of France, and to send in small pinnaces to discover all the coast along. If I hear of them, I hope ere it be long after you shall hear news. Good Mr. Secretary, let the Narrow Seas be well strengthened. What charge is ill spent now for surety ? Let the hoys of Harwich go with all speed again to my Lord Henry Seymour, for they be of great service.

Sir, for these things here, I pray take order with Mr. Darell, for I have no leisure to think of them. I pray you, Sir, deliver my letter unto her Majesty with my humble duty, and so in haste I bid you farewell. Aboard the Ark, this Sunday, at 12 of the clock at night.

Your assured loving friend,
C. HOWARD.

Sir, God willing, I will cut ¹ sail within this three hours.

June 23.—LORD HOWARD TO THE COUNCIL.

[ccxi. 52.—Signed. Addressed.]

May it please your Lordships :—Even as I had made up a packet of letters unto Mr. Secretary, one Richard Swansey, a pursuivant, came unto me. Two hours after, another pursuivant, with your Lordships' letters. I will take what order I can, as the shortness of the time will permit me, for I mean, God willing, to set sail within these two hours, having received some advertisements which make me to make all the haste I can out unto the sea. My victual came but this last morning about twe of the clock ; and since, we have laboured very hard for the taking of them in, for we were very bare left before they came. And yet we meant, if they did not come this day, to have gone out to the sea, although we had but three days' victual. I pray your Lordships that some money may be speedily sent down unto Mr. Darell, for the avoiding of all danger if the towns do not prove so ready to revictual their ships as your Lordships do expect. And so most heartily praying your Lordships to bear with my hasty and short writing, being overcharged with business now at our setting forth, I take my leave, the 23rd of June, 1588.

Your Lordships' loving friend to command,

C. HOWARD.

Right Honourable :—Although I do very well know that your Honour shall be at large advertised by my very good Lord, the Lord Admiral, that the Spanish forces are descried to be near at hand in several companies on our coast, as it is reported for certain by three barks unto whom they gave chase and made shot, yet have I thought it good also to write these few lines unto your Honour; nothing doubting but that, with God's assistance, they shall be so sought out and encountered withal in such sort as (I hope) shall qualify their malicious and long pretended¹ practices. And therefore, I beseech your Honour to pray continually for our good success in this action, to the performance whereof we have all resolutely vowed the adventure of our lives, as well for the advancement of the glory of God, as the honour and safety of her Majesty, her realms and dominions. And thus, resting always ready to perform what shall lie in my power, either in duty or service to my prince and country, I humbly take my leave. Your Honour's very ready to be commanded,

It is very probable that he was the nephew of Mary Newton, Drake's first wife, married in 1569, at St. Budeaux, where in 1560 Margaret Newton married John Bodenham. On the father's side he would seem to have belonged to Hereford, of which county Roger Bodenham was sheriff in 1585 and again in 1593. [ccxi. 58.—Holograph. Addressed.]

Sir:—To iterate my opinion, with confirmation of better judgment, I fear no attempt for England this year more than still I doubt the continuance of private practising, policies wherewith these Italians have continually been trained.

To urge pro and contra this.

The Duke of Parma hath ready 30,000 expert soldiers, to transport either for England or Scotland. His own private strength (without the assistance of Spain or France) doth not exceed 40 sails of fly-boats and 220 bylanders. A time must be to land them and a time to back them.

Answer.

England, I least doubt, because he is cut off from faction within our own country ; besides, one of our men upon defence is worth two of an enemy for offence, being not supported through civil discord. Also our strength of shipping, being not severed, with some longer continuance of victuals, must cross and thwart the foresaid attempts, if wind and weather assist us to attend them.

All I fear is they will never offer themselves, specially on the seas, in place where service may be tried. And to that end, we have twice showed ourselves at Gravelines, desiring nothing more than to suffer them come out, rather than to stop them in by sinking vessels with stones or timber, which will be recovered again upon every ebb, and will serve them for their strength and better fortification.

Concerning Scotland, if the news be true which a Scot this day informed me from Dundee, it seemeth that the King doth take a course to keep friendship with us, by some acts lately performed four days past, videlicet, the executing the Lord Maxwell¹ his brother, and imprisoning the Lord Maxwell himself; which if the same be current and sure, I doubt not but your honourable wisdom will back the continuance of such good actions. Where otherwise they should join and take part with Spain, I hope their attempts shall cost more than one battle or two, before they should approach London.

Thus having answered your letter by delivering my private opinion, do wish that Zealand be circumspectly looked into ; for I understand that companies of Arnemuiden and Campvere are dismissed lately, which may give the enemy great advantages to lie in wait for the same. So expecting some seasonable weather and more favourable winds, do take my leave. Aboard the Rainbow, this 26th of June, 1588.

Your assured loving friend to command,

H. SEYMOUR.

The two brothers Musgrave, the one captain for Yarmouth the other for Lynn, as well by their own accord as the general consent, voluntarily yield another month's victuals, desiring in no sort to have her Majesty charged ; and truly, Sir, if you knew them as well [as ¹] I, they deserve special thanks.

she may sooner fall into the hands of the Lord Admiral; and as yet the wind being so contrary hath retained all the shipping in Dunkirk; likewise the Spaniards, if they have intention to set forward. VICTUALLING.*

[ccxi. 70.—Endorsed: 'For my Lord Treasurer'; and in Burghley's hand: 'Ulto. Junii, 1588. Mr. Quarles' book of the victualling of the Lord Admiral [and] Lord Henry.']

30^{mo} die Junii 1588.

A declaration unto your Lordship how and unto what time her Majesty's ships be victualled, as well those that be with my Lord Admiral southward as also those ships that be with my Lord Henry Seymour on the Narrow Seas, videlicet:—

Ships 16 of her Majesty's which went with my [Lord] Admiral.

Men in the said 16 ships, 3,736.

First, my Lord Admiral had one month's victual which he took with him for all her Majesty's ships, which victuals began the 19th day of May and ended the 15th day of June, his Lordship being at Plymouth, where Mr. Darell did presently victual the said fleet for 6 days longer, which ended the 21st of June. The 22nd of June arrived at Plymouth ¹ The MS. here has Flud: in other places Seymour wrote Fludd, or Floyd; the true name was probably the more familiar Flood or Lloyd.

15 ships sent from London with one month's victual more, which doth serve the said fleet until the 20th day of July ; and then, as it appeareth by Mr. Darell's letter dated the 2nd day of June, he had both order and money by my Lord Admiral and Sir Francis Drake to provide one month's victual more, which beginneth the 21st of July, and doth end the 18th of August.

Besides this, his Lordship hath sent him by the said 15 ships a proportion for 14 days for biscuit and beer ; and more, as it do appear by Mr. Darell's letters dated as aforesaid, his Lordship hath, for a convenient time, biscuit, newland fish, wine, cider, rice, oil and pease, to serve the whole fleet.

Ships of her Majesty with my Lord Henry Seymour, 15.

Men with my Lord Henry Seymour on the Narrow Seas in the [15] ships, 1,471.

My Lord Henry Seymour had one month's victual sent him to the Narrow Seas, which began the 16th day of June and is to end the 14th day of July.

Likewise, by your Lordship's order, there was a supply of victual sent to my Lord Henry Seymour for 18 days more, which beginneth the 15th day of July and is to end the last of the said month, and so is to begin a new proportion the 1st of August.

Ships of sundry ports with my Lord Henry
Seymour, and victualled for one month, 18.

Men in the ships from the ports, 800.

More, there is victualled by your Lordship's order divers ships, which serve under my Lord Henry Seymour, for one month, which doth begin their victuals the 25th of June and is to end the 23rd of July.

ADVERTISEMENT¹ TO WALSYNGHAM.

[ccxi. 95.—Endorsed.]

It is reported that all those ships that are seen for Spain, and from Spain hither, have aboard the English flag, the French flag, and the Bourgogne² flag ; and when they are hailed by her Majesty's navy, they say that they are French, and so speak French, by which means they go and come. It were very necessary that my Lord Seymour had word to command all his fleet that what boat soever they meet, that [they³] should bring him to him to be examined ; and my Lord should have aboard of himself some one discreet person, that had of late haunted these ports, thereby to discover their men and ships, and such as could speak Flemish. By these means, it is assured me you shall meet with many.

The three ships that I wrote unto you that were going out of Dunkirk, are manned with pilots to be distributed among the navy. My hope is that [they³] shall be met withal. They lads⁴ be shipped ;

³ Omitted in MS.

⁴ Those pilots are shipped, which seems an indication that presently &c.

and truly by that it may be thought presently they will do somewhat.

It is here said that the Spanish navy shall be reinforced with a number of French ships; and that they shall have all the favour that may be in all the French havens; and I do sooner believe it, for that I hear that all the captains of these haven-towns are sworn to the League.

July 4.—MEMORANDUM BY DRAKE.

[ccxii. 9.—Copy. Endorsed :—Sir Francis Drake's opinion touching our going to the coast of Spain.]

To maintain my opinion that I have thought it meet to go for the coast of Spain, or at least more nearer than we are now, are these reasons following : written aboard her Majesty's good ship the Revenge, this fourth of July, 1588.

The first, that hearing of some part of the Spanish fleet upon our coast, and that in several fleets, the one of eleven sail, the other of six sail, and the last of eighteen, all these being seen the 20th and 21st of June; since which time, we being upon the coast of France, could have no intelligence of their being there, or passing through our Channel; neither hearing, upon our own coast, of their arrival in any place, and speaking with a bark which came lately out of Ireland, who can advertise nobody of their being in those parts, I am utterly of opinion that they are returned, considering what ways¹ they have had since that time; otherwise they could have been here without our knowledge.

¹ MS. wayes: possibly a mistake of the clerk who copied it, for weather. In Elizabethan writing th is very apt to be mistaken for y; and Drake's writing, at the best, is a very difficult scrawl.

I say further, that if they be returned, our staying here in this place shall but spend our victual, whereby our whole action is in peril, no service being done. For the lengthening of our victual by setting a straiter order for our company, I find them much discontented if we stay there; whereas, if we proceed, they all promise to live with as little portion as we shall appoint unto them.

Our being upon the coast of Spain will yield us true intelligence of all their purposes.

The taking of some of their army shall much daunt them, and put a great fear amongst them.

My opinion is altogether that we shall fight with them much better cheap¹ upon their own coast than here; for that I think this one of the unmeetest places to stay for them.

To conclude, I verily believe that if we undertake no present service, but detract time some few days, we shall hardly be able to perform any matter of importance.

FRANCIS DRAKE.

July 14.—CONSIDERATIONS BY FENNER.

[ccxii. 10.—Holograph.² Endorsed.]

Considerations to move the proceedings of her Majesty's fleet to go for the coast of Spain, to take there opportunity of the accident fallen out by the return of the Spanish fleet, the rather thereby utterly to dissolve them.

First, I set down to your Lordship the reasons we have of their return. They were seen the 19th of June, thirty of their fleet, in their general companies, with crosses painted red on their foresails ; they chased some of Falmouth, and near thereabout, not many leagues South-West of Lizard, the parties chased witnessing the same in their own persons.

The 21st of June, a bark of Dublin taken by them some 15 leagues South-West of Lizard ; which bark, being by them towed in foul weather, the cable breaking, escaped with three persons, and six of their company being into the Spaniards, and so bare unto the sea South-West ; being 18 sail in number, great hulks and very full of Spaniards, not less than ten thousand by composition.¹

From the 21st of June until the sixth of July we could not intercept any news of their arrival in England, France, Ireland, or Scotland, which argueth plainly their companies dispersed. As also one Mr. Hawes of London (if I mistake not his name) met with several companies of them dispersed at sea ; so as that they cannot be but returned, in that they have had sundry times large² winds to enter Sleeve again.

Which causes considered, it was thought meet the 5th of July to bear out into the sea, until Ushant bare of us East-South-East, and Scilly North-West and by North, some 15 leagues of either, with pinnaces placed between the body of the fleet and Ushant, as also Scilly, thereby none to enter the Sleeve but that we must have sight of them. Otherwise, lying in the middle of the Channel, as we did before, with the body of the fleet, and Ushant as also Scilly thereby, if the wind came southerly, they might haul³ the coast of France, if the North-

We still say 'to haul the wind.'

West, they might haul the coast of England, and not by us for the present to be impeached.

In the mean season, some of our fleet had been at Plymouth, as also at Conquet in France, and no news but that they were dispersed and returned in great misery, as by sickness and foul weather much beaten and spoiled. Also we understood of their return by a pilot of Conquet ; the like in effect from the Mayor of Rochelle, in that he certified many of their fleet to be seen about Cape Finisterre some days after the sight of them upon the coast ; withal [by] three English mariners now in our company, which came from Rochelle in a bark of Millbrooke. Upon their coming from thence, [they] were aboard a pinnace of Rochelle then coming from the sea,¹ and had taken two Spale² Spaniards of 30 tons apiece, laden with wine and oil, who did deliver the certainty of the dispersion of the fleet into many harbours of the coast of Biscay and other places.

Which several advertisements considered, and lying in the place aforesaid as between Scilly and Ushant, the wind coming up northerly, it was thought meet by my Lord Admiral and the rest of us of council to take the benefit of time, and not to lose the opportunity of so happy an accident, but to persecute³ their waste and dissolving, by our going upon the coast of Spain to seek the place of their dispersed companies, and to seek by all possible means their waste.

It is to be considered so mighty an army of three years' preparation, and with so many estates and provisions of horsemen, being gathered together by so great a prince and so great colleagues out of so many and so far countries, wherein there are in number above twenty thousand that have not tasted the seas before. And now, by the providence of God, the burdens aforesaid laid upon them have so abated the pride of their minds, so as no doubt it hath stirred a deadly grief in the secrets of their hearts against all those that have been the procures of their enterprise, wherein they have wasted themselves, touching their reputation, spent the colleagues' treasury, and abated (by their return) the pride of the Prince of Parma his forces, in that the thread of both their hopes by this accident is cut asunder. Therefore more meet to be followed with effect.

Now were utterly to be beaten down the hope of any good success to them, by visiting their coast and following their ruin; my most gracious Majesty thereby delivered of their malicious determinations and practices against her royal person and country. We should now have to do with amazed and discontented companies, so as they cannot (in my poor opinion) proceed against ¹ this summer season, in that their provisions are wasted, their companies wearied, their fleet not to be relieved in the several places where they are of their distresses. Their great companies considered, not in season to be refreshed with water for such a journey; in that they must use at least six thousand butts of water, wherein no doubt they shall have great want of cask, considering the use at sea in such journeys to save ² their casks, for keeping of their ships unpestered.

Withal their mariners, being of sundry nations, and by all the advertisements we can gather very unwilling to meet with our forces at sea, have been, since their first proceedings, by severe punishment and political orders kept together, otherwise their minds have been to run away, both Spaniards and Flemings, Portingals and French, by all which nations they are but means¹ suited with mariners.

Many of the causes aforesaid have moved the most part of us earnestly to give counsel to lose no time in the proceeding to their coast, to the effect aforesaid, so as no man to make estimate of their lives, or burdens in want of victual, respecting² the weightiness of the cause, and to relieve ourselves upon the enemy, the greater to our reputation. To have stayed and gone for the coast of England to have relieved the wants of victual in some, by that means the rest had been in the same predicament; and therefore, the wind being northerly, the 7th of July at three of the clock in the afternoon [it was] concluded to go for Spain, Ushant bearing of us East-North-East, next hand³ some 15 leagues off.

The 9th of July being shot⁴ some ten leagues off South and by West of Ushant, the wind came up at South-West, blowing much wind. Thereby bear⁵ up for England again, in that divers of the small shipping were but meanly victualled, so as to refresh them and the rest, and so, at the first wind, to seek them out on the coast of Spain, and as⁶ her Majesty may hear no news of them again. For this their army at sea being thoroughly dissolved, he shall never be able to gather together the like again, which easily satisfy her Majesty and ease a mighty charge, which may hereafter lie upon [her] Majesty and

And therefore, since God hath made manifest the means, I pray unto the Lord to continue your willingness in mind to the execution thereof, which now is to be done (the fleet being together) with a far more easier charge and adventure than at another time.

[ccxii. 16.—Signed. Endorsed.]

Right Honourable :—According to your Lordships' commandment signified to me by Mr. Quarles, I have sent herewith a note of the ships now at sea under the charge of the Lord Admiral, with their numbers of men and time of victualling, so near as far as myself I know or can learn. Wherein what shall remain doubtful unto your Lordships touching the determination¹ of the victuals for that fleet which I have come down with my Lord, it may please you to be more fully informed thereof by those that have had the charge of their former proportions, who, understanding by this note what hath been delivered here, will soon set down what ought to remain. As for the ships set forth by the port towns, forasmuch as the charge thereof did nothing concern me, I have not acquainted myself much with it; only now, understanding your Lordships' pleasures, I have set down as much thereof as of late by credible report I have learned; and also have required Richard Swanson, messenger of the Chamber sent hither by your Lordships about those causes, in his return by the way to bring unto your Lordships a certain note of the rest.²

It may please your Lordships also to understand that by reason the ships which are at her Majesty's charge have been all supplied with fresh victual here, in this long time of their stay in harbour, I am grown indebted in the country near to the sum of 900*l.*, as hath appeared particularly unto my Lord Admiral, and thereof I think he hath already informed your Lordships. I humbly therefore beseech you to give your speedy order for the discharge thereof, whereby your Lordships shall much help my poor credit amongst them. And so, with remembrance of my duty, I most humbly take my leave. At Plymouth, the 5th of July, 1588.

Right Honourable:—Having received commandment from the Council to certify what number of ships and men are now at sea under the charge of the Lord Admiral, and for what time they are severally victualled, I have performed the same as directly as I could, and do send your Honour herewithal a copy thereof, wherein if anything may [yet] seem doubtful unto their Lordships touching the victualling of the ships at her Majesty's charge, Mr. Quarles may inform their Lordships of it more particularly. Only I have omitted to set down in that note the number of men in the coast ships, the certainty whereof I could not learn; and therefore have presumed to refer the same unto this bearer¹ (one of the messengers sent down by your Honour about those causes), who is to bring their Lordships a true report thereof from the towns that have set them forth. And so leaving to trouble your Honour further at this time, most humbly take my leave. At Plymouth, the 5th of July, 1588.

July 6.—HOWARD TO WALSYNGHAM.

[ccxii. 18.—Signed. Addressed. In very bad condition.]

Sir :—Being here in the midst of the Channel of the Sleeve, on Friday, being the 5th of this month, I received your letter of the 28th of June, and another of the same date which was written after you had made up your packet. The cause of the long time that these letters were in coming unto me was because the pursuivant, embarking himself upon Monday at Plymouth, was fain to beat up and down the [sea] with a contrary wind until Friday [before] he could [find me].

By your first letter I find how greatly you stand assured that neither the French King, nor the havens and port towns that stand for the King, will give any help or assistance unto the Spanish army. As for Newhaven, it is not a place to serve their turns.

By your other letter you perceive from an advertisement you have from my brother Stafford,¹ that there is money sent down to Brest and Conquet for the relief and assistance of the Spanish fleet if they arrive there. I [wish with all] my heart that they were there with the [best welcome they could] give them. [It should not be long] after but that I would give them another welcome; for if it be they mean to touch there, then assuredly they have a meaning to join forces with the Duke of Parma. I have no doubt but that my Lord Henry Seymour, being [so] strong as he is, will have a care that he shall not start any whither to meet them. And it shall be very well that you have some trusty espial¹ there to give certain intelligence when the Duke's forces shall be ready, [that then, my Lord] Henry Seymour may lie in the [mouth of] their haven to interrupt their coming forth.

I am sorry to perceive by your letter that [her Majesty hath] no more care to have forces about her, considering the great peril that may come by neglecting that which should be done in time. I have written again unto her Majesty very earnestly about it, and I hope that God will put into her mind to do that which may tend most to her safety.

I am sure you have seen the letter which I sent unto her Majesty of the discovery of certain of the Spanish fleet not far off of Scilly, which made me to make as much haste out to sea as I could ; for upon Sunday our victuals came to us, and having the wind at North-East, I would not stay the taking in of them all ; but taking in some part of them, I appointed the rest to follow with me, and so bare to Scilly, thinking to have cut off those Spanish ships [seen] there from the rest of their fleet ; but the wind continued not 16 hours there, but turned South-South-West, that we were fain to lay it off and on in the Sleeve, and could get no further. Then did I send Sir Francis Drake with half a score ships and three or four pinnaces into the Trade, to discover it. In his way, hard aboard Ushant, he met with a man of mine, whom I had sent out in a bark ten days before to lie off and on there for discovery, who had met with an Irish [bark and] stayed her, which had been with the [18] great ships of the Spanish fleet 16 [leagues South-South¹]-West of Scilly. They had taken out of the said [bark] five of her most principal men, and left in her but three men and a boy. One of the greatest Spanish ships towed her at her stern by a cable, which in the night time, the wind blowing somewhat stiff, brake, and so she escaped in the storm. This did assure us greatly that the Spanish fleet was broken in the storms which had been afore ; and by all likelihood, we conjectured, if the wind had continued northerly that they [would have] returned back again [to the] Groyne ; but [as the wind] hath served [these] six or seven days, [we] must look for them every hour if they mean to come hither.

Sir, I sent a fine Spanish caravel an eight days ago to the Groyne to learn intelligence, such a one as would not have been mistrusted ; but when she was fifty leagues on her way, this southerly wind forced her back again unto us. Therefore I pray you, if you hear or understand of any news [or] advertisements by land, that I may hear of them from you with expedition.

I have divided myself here into three parts, and yet we lie within sight one of another, so as, if any of us do discover the Spanish fleet, we give notice thereof presently the one to the other, and thereupon repair and assemble together. I myself do lie in the middle of the Channel, with the greatest force. Sir Francis Drake hath 20 ships and four or five pinnaces, which lie towards Ushant ; and Mr. Hawkyns, with as many more, lieth towards Scilly. Thus are we fain to do, else with this wind they might pass by and we [never] the wiser.

Whatsoever hath been made of the S[leeve, it] is another manner of thing than it was taken for ; we find it by experience and daily observation to be an hundred miles over ; a large room for men to look unto. And whereas it is thought that we should have regard [unto the] forces of the [said] fleet, if [they] should bend for Scotland, they would in their [way] thither keep so far away westward off Cape Cl[ear] as they would be farther from us at any time than [it] is betwixt England and Spain ; so that the best advertisement that we must hope for must be from you by the knowledge that you shall have over land out of Scotland, if they be discovered there. And then our best and nearest course will be unto them through the Narrow Seas, where I have no doubt but we shall defeat them of their fleet, whatsoever they do with [their land] men. But for my own part I can not [persuade myself but tha]t their inte[n]t is for Ireland]. Where there are so many doubts, we [must proceed] by the likelier ways, and leave unto God [to] direct for the best. And so I bid you most heartily farewell. From off aboard her Majesty's good ship the Ark, the 6th of July, 1588.

Your assured loving friend,
C. HOWARD.

July 8.—THE COUNCIL TO DARELL.

[ccxii. 23.—Endorsed. A rough draft with many interlinear corrections.]

After our hearty commendations :—We find by a late note you have sent us, bearing date the 4th of July, of such ships as serve in those parts under our very good Lord the Lord Admiral, that for such of the said ships as were brought into those parts by his Lordship, you cannot set down a true estimate for what time they are victualled, unless you were made acquainted with their former victualling ; but for the rest of the ships that serve under Sir Francis Drake, and others that are entertained in her Majesty's pay there, as also the coast ships, it appeareth by your said note that they are victualled but until the 14th of July, saving that Sir Francis Drake hath a supply of seven days' victual more for the number of ships appointed to serve under him. Which being true, we do not see but the most part of the ships shall be forced to give over the service, a matter we do very greatly mislike of ; and therefore we think it very convenient that you should provide a month's victual for all the whole navy serving there under his Lordship, wherein there would¹ be all diligence possible used, especially if they be furnished for no longer time than the 14th of this month, as is contained in your said note.

And for such money as doth appear by your letters to be due there, amounting to the sum of 900*l.*, as also such further sums as shall be necessarily employed in the provision of the said month's victual, we will take order that the same shall be sent down with all speed by our loving friend Richard Quarles, Esq., whom we think very meet to repair to those parts for the better advancement of the service. In the meantime, we would have you take up, upon your credit, such provisions and other necessities as the said service shall require. And for your better assistance therein, we send you certain commissions directed unto the Lieutenants² and other principal officers in the counties where the said provisions are to be made.

And so requiring [you] to advertise us by what time the said month's victuals will be ready, and whether in the meantime the provisions in the said ships will be able to hold out, whereby the service may not be given over. . . .

July 8.—THE COUNCIL TO THE DEPUTY-LIEUTENANTS AND OTHERS.

[ccxii. 23, I.—Rough draft.]

Whereas Marmaduke Darell, gentleman, a servant of her Majesty in household, is appointed to make certain provisions within the county, as well of grain as of flesh and other necessities, for the victualling of her Majesty's navy serving in the western seas under our very good Lord the Lord Admiral, and is also to use divers necessary ministers [for] the said service :—

These are to will and require you, as also, in her Majesty's name, straitly to charge and command you, to afford the said Darell and his deputies bearing this placart under our hands, your uttermost aid and assistance—for such service requireth expedition—as well in taking up the said provisions as also for the transporting of them to Plymouth or other place upon the sea coast, where he shall appoint.

And such sums of money as shall be due to any of her Majesty's subjects, either for provisions taken of them or for their labour and pains employed in the carriage of the same or otherwise, we will take order the same shall be repaid unto them out of hand, to their contentment.

And therefore we are to require both you and them not to fail in the furtherance of this service, as you will answer to contrary at your perils.

To the Deputy-Lieutenants in the County of . . . , and to all Justices of Peace, Mayors, Sheriffs, Bailiffs, Constables, or any other her Majesty's Officers, Ministers, and loving subjects, to whom it may appertain, and to every of them.

July 11.—DARELL TO THE COUNCIL.

[ccxii. 32.—Holograph. Addressed.]

My duty unto your most honourable Lordships humbly remembered :—Understanding by your letter of the 8th of this month (which came to my hands yesternight) that it is your Lordships' pleasure to have a month's victual more provided for the whole navy now in service under my Lord Admiral with all speed, and to be advertised from me in what time the same may be ready ; as also whether in the meantime, without it, the ships will be able to continue at sea :—

It may please your Lordships there shall be all diligence possible used in the performance of it, according to your commandment. The commissions from your Lordships I do send away this morning ; and will also despatch away such other purveyors as shall be meet, with all the expedition I can.

Yet, forasmuch as I do judge the whole number of men that do serve in this fleet to be about 9,500, which, to be furnished for a month, will require a great mass of victual, I think it cannot be well performed in less space than a month ; and very true it is that, according to the note I sent your Lordships, the time of their former victualling will end in them all long before. But so it is, Right Honourable, that my Lord Admiral and Sir Francis Drake, to prevent this want and inconvenience, which else must of necessity now have been, did long since—as I do certainly understand—take order for the placing of six men to a mess at sea ; which no doubt hath been observed, and thereby their victual much lengthened. By means whereof, as also because myself, expecting of late some further service, have already provided many things here beforehand, I hope to furnish them with this month's victual in due time, and without the inconvenience which your Lordships do doubt of. Only I will presume in the meantime, until I may understand your Lordships' further pleasure, to write forthwith unto my Lord Admiral that it may please him to send those ships hither for their victual first that have most need; who no doubt—the fleet lying so near unto this coast—may return unto him again in short space, almost howsoever the wind be, and carry with them some store also for the rest. His Lordship may send, as he pleaseth, eight or ten sail at once, upon whose return others may come; and to want so many for a short time, I trust will be no great weakening unto the whole fleet. Otherwise I do not know how I shall be able to send it from hence to them, the shipping that is left here is so small and unfit for such a purpose. And so leaving the rest unto your honourable considerations, I do most humbly take my leave. From Plymouth, this 11th of July in the morning, 1588.

It may please your Lordships, the Mayors of Bristol and Lyme have written unto me to furnish their ships with two months' victual more, according to your Lordships' last letters to them in that behalf.

Your Lordships' most humble,
MAR. DARELL.

July 12.—SEYMOUR TO WALSYNGHAM.

[ccxii 34.—Holograph. Addressed.]

Sir:—Such summer season saw I never the like; for what for storms and variable unsettled winds, the same unsettleth and altereth our determinations for lying on the other coast, having of late sundry times put over, with southerly winds, so far as Calais; and suddenly enforced, still with westerly great gales, to return to our English coasts, where, so long as this unstable weather holdeth, and that¹ the same serveth well many times for the Spaniards to come (vix credo), yet shall they be as greatly endangered by the raging seas as with their enemies.

And to heap on braveries for conquering little England, that hath always been renowned, and now most famous by the great discovered strength, as well by sea as by land, the same also united with thousands resolute civil minds, how can the same enter into my conceit they should any ways prevail? when heretofore, our country, being divided with many kings, the people barbarous and uncivil, resisted mightily long before they could be conquered.

But to digress from my own singular opinion, and to give place to your honourable further authorities, I received letters from Sir William Russell, which I send here-inclosed, hoping that all your Honours will be most careful to regard those quarters, the same being of so great weight and importance for the enemy's advantages.

This, also returning a note of all our coast ships discharged and that are absent, do leave any further to trouble you. From aboard the Rainbow, the 12th of July, 1588, in the small Downs, where I have much ado to send my letters ashore.

[ccxii. 42.—Holograph. Addressed. In deplorable condition.¹]

Sir :—I have received your letter of the 3rd of the present [this day ²], being the 13th of the same, within two hours after I [had despatched ²] Sir E. Hoby. The messenger had been at the sea to [seek me ever ²] since Friday. I am very sorry to perceive by your [letter that ³] her Majesty [doth think ³] that we have not [sufficiently sought ³] to understand some certainty of the Spanish fleet. Sir, we are here to small purpose for this great service, if that hath not been thought of. Both before my coming, by Sir Francis Drake, and since my coming, there hath been no day but there hath been pinnaces, Spanish caravels, flyboats, and of all sorts, sent out to discover there. The winds hath been so southerly, and such foul weather as that they could not [recover ³] the coast of Spain so near as to take any of their fisher boats ; and to send some of our fisher boats to discover there, they would do as [much good ²] as to send oysterboat of Billingsgate ; for neither can they bear sail [at all, nor able to ³] brook the seas ; [and if any had ²] been at the seas when the pinnaces were abroad, [they would not ³] have seen home again ; and if the weather had [been such that ²] some fisherman might have gone, yet as soon as ever they had been seen, they would have been taken up, with their boats, which [be the worst ³] of the world.

³ Conjecture.

Sir, I did send a caravel of Sir F. Drake's [fourteen days¹] ago, which was of any other least to be mistrusted ; but [before he²] could come to their coast, he met with a contrary wind [that turned¹] him back and brake [his] mast and yard, and much [to do to rec¹]over home again. I [sent] within three days after, a flyboat which is an excellent sailer. A man of Sir Walter Raleigh's went in her, one Hawes,³ a very proper man. He met off Ushant 16 leagues with certain of their ships, as it shall appear by his letter which I send you. My own pinnace hath been well beaten [and] hath had 18 [grea]t sh[ot, which hath torn her hull and¹] sails ; and by all likelihood, a Frenchman that served in their fleet ; for she was double manned and came from Spain, and a good tall ship. We have at this time four pinnaces on the coast of Spain ; but, Sir, you may see what [may co²]me of the sending me out with so little victuals, and the [evil of the same²]. For had I [not then²] been driven in for [lack] of victuals, we had met just with some of them not far [off Ushant⁴] ; for we came in with the storm at South the 22nd, and they fell with Scilly the next day after, an 18 sail of them. But, Sir, by all likelihood they be returned with very great harms.

Sir, I am now sending out two pinnaces more, and I trust her Majesty will think that shall be done

³ Possibly Ralph Hawes, who appears in the list of ships as captain of the Unicorn of Dartmouth.

⁴ Conjecture. Bruce has 'off Scilly,' which seems inadmissible. Howard here says he came in to Plymouth on the 22nd and the Spanish ships were off Scilly on the 23rd. From his letter and advertisement of the 22nd (ante, pp. 220-1), it appears that he came in on the 21st and that the Spaniards were seen near Scilly the same day. Had he not been driven back on the 20th by a storm at South, he must have met them off Ushant rather than near Scilly.

that may be possible. I send you an advertisement that came to me even now, and I look every hour for more.

Sir F. Drake and all here do think no [gain] in sending any fishermen; for as many as shall be sent, we [can] never look for any again. I know not what weather you have had there, but there was never any such summer seen here on the sea. God of his mercy¹ keep us from sickness, for we fear that more than any hurt that the Spaniards will do [this fleet], if the advertisements be true. Well, Sir, I would her Majesty did know of the care and pains that is taken here of all men for her service. We must now man ourselves again, for we have cast many overboard, and a number in great extremity which we discharged. I [have] sent with all expedition a prest for more men. And so I bid [you most] heartily farewell.

Your assured loving friend,

C. HOWARD.

It² hath pleased my Lord Admiral to command me to write my knowledge touching our espials. I assure your Honour there could not have been more care taken than his Lordship hath from time to time given order for; and it is now certainly known that they are all returned back, much distressed; and as for fisherboats, they are neither meet and can [not³] endure the seas.

Your Honour's faithfully to be commanded,

July 14.—ABSTRACT OF THE ANSWERS OF THE MAYORS.

[ccxii. 43.]

The Answer of the Mayors of the Coast Towns on the West parts to the letters of the Lords of her Majesty's most honourable Privy Council, touching the re-victualling of the shipping set forth by them. Taken by me, Richard Swanson, one of her Majesty's messengers :—

Robert Brockinge, deputy to the Mayor of Bridgwater, answereth, that upon receipt of letters from the Right Honourable the Lord High Admiral of England, the contents of your Honours' letters were accomplished before the receipt thereof; and further answers, that if need require so, they will strain themselves for two months' more re-victualling.

Sir John Barron's answer, Mayor of Bristol, was that, after conference had with the rest of his brethren, both your Honours and Mr. Darell should be certified of their determination; and upon my return thither, he said that one was sent to take order for re-victualling.

John Jones, Mayor of Lyme, sent one forthwith to take order for re-victualling; but most humbly craveth at your Honours that the towns of Axminster and Chard, refusing to yield both to the first and this last victualling, may by your good Lordships be brought thereunto; being towns appointed to be contributories thereunto. Answering further, that if need so require, the merchants of the town of Lyme are contented to disburse in whole two subsidies, so that the towns of Axminster and Chard may be brought to disburse but one subsidy; which, as they judge, will be sufficient to discharge this past, and two months more to come.

John Peryam, Mayor of Exeter, answereth that order is taken, according to your Honours' letters, for the re-victualling of two months longer.

John Wyse, Mayor of Totness, answereth that order is taken, according to your Honours' letters, for the re-victualling of two months longer.

William Hawkyns, Mayor of Plymouth, answereth that order is taken, according to your Honours' letters, for the re-victualling of two months longer.

John Porter, Mayor of Saltash, answereth that order was taken with Sir Francis Drake, Knight, for the sum of 150*l*., to discharge them of all manner of charges of victualling ; which money is already paid. But this composition, I learned, was taken at the first setting forth of their ship.

The names of the Ships set forth by the Coast Towns on the West parts, with the number of men ¹ belonging to every of them :—

July 16.—MEMORANDUM BY SIR E. HOBY.

[ccxii. 51.—Endorsed.]

The occasion of my Lord Admiral his sending me up hath been only to signify unto her Majesty what hath passed in all this season, and to resolve her Highness of the present estate of her army; as also to bring down with me her Majesty's resolution and free liberty how she would have him to lie, or attempt aught on the enemy's coast.

July 17.—THOMAS CELY¹ TO BURGHLEY.

[ccxii. 57.—Holograph. Addressed.]

Right Honourable, my duty remembered:—My very good Lord,—I would write unto your Honour more oftener than I do, but I am not in place where I may do it. My Lord Admiral and Sir Francis Drake doth employ me to sea, for to see if I can meet with any shipping² coming out of Spain, which I have done divers times, and the intelligence³ that I have gotten from time to time I have done⁴ my Lord to understand of them. I am bound unto my Lord and to Sir Francis, for that they have such trust in me to do those things which standeth a trusty subject to do. I pray God I may deserve unto her Majesty, and to my Lord and to Sir Francis, the credit and trust that they suppose in me.

Your Honour hath had letters of late that their fleet is dispersed. Truth is, I have been four times in France, and have brought¹ intelligence from time to time unto my Lord, and brought the ships with me sometimes, for that my Lord should get out some more matter than I could do. Captain Fenner² hath done the like, and Captain Crosse. I learn by these three hulks that Fenner and Crosse hath brought in, that the news which I had before is all one, and that there is two of their four galleys left, and two of their galleasses hath rolled their masts overboard, and many of their fleet hath broken their yards and other their tackling; notwithstanding, I learn by these men that they have a new supply of victual from Lisbon,³ and that they arm⁴ themselves as fast as they can to proceed in their wicked and malicious attempt. Therefore I think it good for us to arm ourselves to sea with all speed,⁵ and to meet with them at sea, if God will give us leave.

My Lord was in a good way, if God had not sent a contrary wind. Our fleet was 80 leagues South and by West off Ushant. If the wind had holden⁶ two days and two nights longer, we had had them in the Groyne, and within three leagues of the Groyne, all their whole⁷ fleet in three sundry harbours, saving 30 hulks which we hear not of.

My Lord doth make what speed he may do to get out again to sea with the most part of the fleet. Truth⁸ is, victual did fall out very short with many of our fleet, and very many contrary winds; and so they continue; God send better. If your Honour do write unto my Lord before we go to sea, haste us away. Good my Lord, I fear me we shall have contrary winds and foul weather until we have a full moon.

My good Lord, a sharp war and a short, although it be chargeable, and that is fit for England. The Queen's subjects doth desire it. If I might a¹ been heard, it had been done ere this day, with a great deal less charges.² Our action hath not gone so forward as it might a done, if things had been furnished³ to my desire. There is none that knoweth what I mean but her Majesty and myself; but this I will say unto your Honour and to all the rest of the Privy Council: that the King of Spain will make our mistress wise within few years, if it be not prevented. It might a been done ere this day if it had pleased her Majesty; and yet it may be done if the Duke of Parma⁴ and the Guise and their friends be foreseen for doing us hurt upon the coast of England, or to enter our country: I say, if they may have the repulse for the year, and my Lord Admiral to defend⁵ their fleet, as I trust in my God he shall do, for this year likewise, her Majesty shall have made for them the next year that they shall have desire to keep their own country.

Do not think to have any quietness with the King of Spain as long as his moneys comes out of the Indies. It is easily to be redressed. I have been desirous to have it known, and yet have I been afraid to move it; for that I have moved unto some of the Council, or at the least way was very willing; and when I have begun to enter into any matter of any importance, one of them told me and said this unto me: Cely, it is told me that you mell⁶ with Councillors' matters. her Majesty any service, so that it did cost¹ money, or that if charges should rise² upon it, never speak of it, for she will never consent unto it. So I went my way with a flea in mine ear.³

Another told me that if I did not make this and this of my counsel, and not to go unto the Queen, I should lose all the Council's good will. Why, my good Lord, if I have or had commandment that I should not open some matter which her Majesty would not have known, should I utter it? No, truly, if I should lose my life for my labour; and peradventure it may be so. My good Lord, I am a poor man, and one that hath been brought up without learning, and one that hath but a patched carcase⁴; for I had thirty-two sundry torments in the Inquisition with the *apretados*⁵—you term them in English rackings; and eight⁶ years in prison lacking but two months. I take it, it was for her Majesty's sake and her subjects.

I have been towards her father and her brother and herself this sixty and two years. I have been no great craver, for I cannot spend one groat by the year by her; and yet her Majesty hath promised me good things; but I have been desirous to do her good, and not always begging, as some be. And yet have I lost above two thousand pounds since I served her Majesty, besides the great and cruel imprisonments in the Inquisition, and in the King of Spain's most filthy galleys, and seven other prisons; and God I take to witness without desert, more than that they approved that I was her sworn man. Truth is, I did strike their secretary as I was before the Inquisidores, they sitting in judgment. I had great reason to do it.

Let these things pass. I am now to crave your Honour that you will be a mean to help to abate the malicious intention of the Spaniard. If her Majesty will, she shall have him brought to pass¹ that he shall be glad to entreat her Majesty to have a peace. And if it do cost her a hundred thousand sovereigns,² she shall have two hundred thousand again, and all of them of the action³ well contented. God is the only giver of victory. My trust is only in him. I will not say but God may have put the same secret⁴ into another man's head as he hath done into mine; but I believe that there is no creature can do it but myself. I once⁵ moved her Majesty that she might have such a thing done. Her Majesty looked very sadly upon me; so I think, in my conscience, she thought it impossible to be done. For in very truth there was a piece of paper which her Majesty did read, and she answered me and said, It cannot be done in time. I asked her if I should show it to two persons in the world living at this present. She said, No. I think in my conscience it was more for that [she] stood in doubt that I could not accomplish [it], and that her Majesty would not have me to come to any foil⁶; for that I am assured her Majesty doth love me. I take it, it was for this, more than for any other thing. He that looks a man in the face knoweth not what is in his purse.⁷ I am of that opinion, that no man can do it but myself. Within one year after it is done, it will bring her Majesty to more quietness, and her countries, than all her Council in seven years.

Good my Lord, bear with my rude and bold¹ manner in writing this word so boldly. I have the very same paper that her Majesty did read ; but I do not send it to your Honour. Good my Lord, tell her Majesty from me that I have not yet told the Spaniards what we be doing in England, but when God sends me to meet with them, I will tell them. But I promise your Honour when I have told them, I will bring them home with me into England.

My Lord, there is three barks taken of late by the Frenchmen, and one of the three is a son's of mine, taken in the road of Lamoster,² near unto Nantes.³ Good my Lord, send my Lord Admiral word whether I may not take a Frenchman for him. Desire her Majesty to request my Lord Admiral and Sir Francis Drake to continue the goodness towards me ; and your Honour's words will be a great credit unto me, favourably written. July 17.—BURGHLEY TO WALSYNGHAM.

[ccxii. 58.—Signed, and holograph postscript. Addressed.]

Sir :—I have at good length, as you may perceive, written to Darell, that hath the dealing for Mr. Quarles at Plymouth for the victualling of the navy. When you have read the letter, I pray you to cause it to be sealed and sent unto him by such means as you have. And so I commend me most heartily to you. From my house near the Savoy, this 17th of July, 1588.

Your assured loving friend,
W. BURGHLEY.

I am very sorry that our counsel for sending one expressly from her Majesty to the Duke of Parma doth not like her. It will be hard for our Commissioners to be informed¹ with such certainty as largely instructed both by speech and writing from hence ; but fiat voluntas sua.

I am at this present, by this last night's torment, weakened in spirits, as I am not able to rise out of my bed : which is my grief the more because I cannot come thither where both my mind and duty do require.

July 17.—BURGHLEY TO DARELL.

[ccxii. 58, I.—Draft, with corrections in Burghley's hand. Endorsed :—Memorandum of my Lord's letter to Mr. Darell at Plymouth.]

I commend me unto you :—Since² such time as, this other day, you have been directed to make a new provision for the victualling of her Majesty's fleet there under the charge of the Lord Admiral and Sir Francis Drake, and money sent down to you for that purpose, the merchants here, of the city, have been dealt withal for a new victualling of their ships for one month more, which they have assented unto ; and are well contented to make the same allowance, after the rate of 14s. the man, as her Majesty giveth ; the numbers whereof, as the same is delivered unto me by a note from them, amounteth unto 1,340 men, who were victualled by them, as they say, until the 10th of the month of August, after the rate of four men to a mess ; which being reduced to five to a mess, as they understand my Lord Admiral brought them and the rest, for the drawing out of the victuals, they have good reason to think, together¹ considering the death of many of their men, that the same should reach at the least to a fortnight more.

But howsoever that falleth out, they are content to allow for one month more after the rate aforesaid ; wherein I pray you to use your best means and credit for the speedy victualling of them ; and for the money due for the same, I will undertake either to have it to be sent down thither unto you, or paid here, or made over by exchange to you, as you shall appoint. And in like sort, I pray you to help, in the best sort you can, the ships of the ports to be victualled, who have also assented to re-victual their own ships for one month more ; and therefore, what furtherance you can give them, by your commissioners or otherwise, I pray you let them find it.

I do not doubt but, considering the order that my Lord Admiral took for the putting of four first to a mess, and afterwards increasing them to six to a mess ; and withal the mortality of a great many, whereof I was sorry to understand, that those numbers, both in my Lord Admiral's fleet and Sir Francis Drake's, will be victualled for some good time with this new supply for one month more; and that the money sent down to you will be more than sufficient for your purpose; but how to judge hereof, I know not; for that there was some fault in you, in that you made not your last certificate, which you sent up hither, so perfect as had been requisite; for that you neither particularly mentioned the numbers of men, nor the vessels wherein they serve; which I pray you by your next certificate to reform, so that it may be understood what numbers serve in every of the ships that were there with Sir Francis Drake, before my Lord Admiral's coming to Plymouth; as also of those numbers brought by my Lord Admiral in every of the ships with him, and of any new numbers supplied by his Lordship after his coming thither. And, as near as you can, what the number at this present are in every of the said ships chargeable to the Queen [for] victualling, with all things otherwise needful for the better understanding and explaining of your doings.

For¹ surely, by your diversity of your certificates, as Mr. Quarles showed them here to me, by your first, we made account that the ships were victualled to the 1st of August or farther, until, by your last, you certified that the ships under Sir Francis Drake, containing 2,821 men, and eight other ships, containing 299 men, being retained into her Majesty's charge by the Lord Admiral, were victualled but to the 14th of July; a matter so strange to us, as Mr. Quarles, considering your former letters, imagined that you had written July for August; but to our grief here, we find it as you did write, which I am right sorry for.

You write also that my Lord Admiral took with him to sail of the victuallers; but what men or victuals they have, you know not; a matter also not well ordered; for I am sure my Lord Admiral, if you had demanded of him the knowledge thereof, he would have certified you.

Though you write that the Mayors of Bristol and Lyme have written to you to furnish their ships with two months' victuals more, according to certain letters of the Council's written to them, yet it was not meant that the charge thereof in money should be upon the Queen; but the provision¹ of the victuals to be made by you for more surety, and the money to be afterwards paid by those two towns. And so have the officers of those towns, and of the rest of the ports, sent word to the Council that they do mean to be at the charges. And therefore you shall do well, if you do make the provision for them yourself, to acquaint them with the charge thereof. If otherwise, they will not² make their own provisions

July 17.—HOWARD TO BURGHLEY.

[ccxii. 59.—Signed. Endorsed.]

My very good Lord :—I have caused Sir Francis Drake and Mr. Hawkyns to consider of your charges, for that our companies grow into great need, and many occasions in such an army doth breed sundry great and extraordinary charges. I have sent herein enclosed an estimate thereof, praying your Lordship that there may be some care had that we may be furnished with money, without the which we are not able to continue our forces together. And when it shall please her Majesty that this army shall be dissolved, it shall be most beneficial to her Majesty that money be had here in a readiness to discharge such as be of this country ; whereby a great sum of money may be saved in lessening of the companies, which will ease very much the charges of victuals, wages and conduct ; which, without money, we shall not be able to do.

If your Lordship do give order to pay the money to Mr. Dr. Hussey, Mr. Hawkyns hath written to him that so much as shall discharge her Majesty's ships serving on the Narrow Seas until the 28th of July, shall be sent to Sir William Wynter, to Dover ; for in this estimate those ships are included until that day. And so I bid your good Lordship heartily farewell. From Plymouth, the 17th of July, 1588.

friend to command,
C. HOWARD.

July 17.—HOWARD TO WALSYNGHAM.

[ccxii. 60.—Signed. Addressed. In bad condition.]

Sir:—I must write as I have occasion by advertisements. I had brought in to me two flyboats of Enkhuysen, which came from Aveiro, and in their coming they did put into the town of Bayona. This was within these twelve days, long since the return of the fleet from our coast. There were none of the fleet there. There was one galley that had been there all this year [to] keep and discover on that [coast¹]. He reported that the whole fleet [were] in the [Groyne, saving a few that be²] in some other places. He also [said] that they do make ready to put out again ; and that [the K]ing doth send to them daily to put out. And, in my opinion, it is very like that they are [not¹] divided into sundry places, as it was reported ; for if they had, some would have been at Bayona.

Sir, I make all the haste I can possible out ; and I, and all my company that came from London, will [not¹] stay for anything. Sir Francis Drake and some of those ships will be ready ; and the rest within three or four days after. And seeing the advertisements be no surer, I mean to keep the three great ships with me yet awhile, to see what will come of it. Some four or five ships have discharged [their men ; for the²] sickness in s[ome] is very great, so that we are fain to discharge some ships, to have their men to furnish the others.

If it had not been to water, and that all the ships set out by the coast towns wanted victuals, I would not have seen this town, for it is hot, being here. Extreme business, which doth belong to such an army, enforceth me to be here more than I would ; but there shall be neither sickness nor death which shall make you³ yield until this service be ended. I never saw nobler minds than be here [in our] forces ; but I cannot stir out but I have an inf[inite number] hanging on my shoulders for money. We do all we [can to re]lieve them. There was a fault, which I will not write of ; but how, I will tell you when I come up ; and if I had not in time looked into it, we should have had much more misery amongst some than we have.

Sir, I have heard that there is in London some hard speeches against Mr. Hawkyns because the Hope came in [to] mend a leak which she had. Sir, I think there were never so many of the prince's ships so long abroad, and in such seas, with such weather as these have had, with so few leaks ; and the greatest fault of the Hope came with ill grounding before our coming hither ; and yet it is nothing to be spoken of. It was such a leak that I durst have gone with it to Venice. But may they not be greatly ashamed that sundry times have [so] disabled her Majesty's ships, which are the only ships of the world ? [Sir,] if you did know the leaks and weakness of other [ships that] be in this fleet, in respect of them it would be said the Queen's Majesty's ships were and are strong. For when the weather hath been bad and rough, the most part of all the navy have besought me that I, and the rest of her Majesty's ships, would bear less sail, for they could not endure it, when we made no reckoning of it. And so I bid you most heartily farewell. From Plymouth, the 17th of July, 1588.

Your very loving and assured friend,
C. HOWARD.

July 17.—HAWKYNS TO BURGHLEY.

[ccxii. 61.—Holograph. Addressed :—For her Majesty's service.]

My bounden duty remembered unto your good Lordship :—By the letter and estimate enclosed, your Lordship may see how charges doth grow here daily. My Lord Admiral doth endeavour by all means to shorten it, and yet to keep the navy in strength.

In this demand is the ships serving under the Lord Henry Seymour included ; and I do write to Mr. Hussey to stay so much money as may clear them.

The four great ships—the Triumph, the Elizabeth Jonas, the Bear, and the Victory—are in most royal and perfect state ; and it is not seen by them, neither do they feel that they have been at sea, more than if they had ridden at Chatham. Yet there be some in them that have no goodwill to see the coast of Spain with them, but cast many doubts how they will do in that seas. But, my good Lord, I see no more danger in them, I thank God, than in others. The Bear one day had a leak, upon which there grew much ado; and when it was determined that she should be lighted of her ordnance, her ballast taken out, and so grounded and searched, and that my Lord Admiral would not consent to send her home, the leak was presently stopped of itself; and so the ship proceedeth with her fellows, in good and royal estate, God be thanked. I was bold to trouble your Lordship with these few words touching these four ships, because I know there will be reports as men are affected; but this is the truth.

The strength of the ships generally is well tried; for they stick not to ground often to tallow, to wash, or any such small cause, which is a most sure trial of the goodness of the ships when they are able to abide the ground. My Lord Admiral doth not ground with his ship, but showeth a good example, and doth shun charges as much as his Lordship may possible. And so I leave to trouble your good Lordship. From Plymouth, the 17th of July, 1588.

Your honourable Lordship's humbly to command,
JOHN HAWKYNs.

Plymouth, delivered as before, assureth my hope that your Honour have received the same. Since that time I intercepted three great flyboats which

given as 'a cross formee.' The device on the seal is, however,

came from San Lucar the 7th of June. Their advertisements which I gathered, I send your Honour herein enclosed.

Understanding by them of seventeen hulks and flyboats more, coming after within some three or four days by their supposition ; as also I gathered, by very politic means and liberality, a great secret in one of those ships ; which the name of the ship being a Hollander, which had my Lord of Leicester his pass, which ship is sold unto Spaniards in San Lucar, and now bound for Dunkirk, laden with wools, and secretly in her, two tons of silver. If the wind and spring serve him not to put in with Dunkirk, he makes no care to put for England or Flushing, in that he hath pass, and is a Hollander.

The Sweden captain which your Honour wrote unto Sir Francis Drake to let pass is one of the company of that fleet.

The ship's name that hath the silver is called the Golden Rose of Enkhuisen. A rose painted in her stern and in her head.

I write your Honour thus largely in that, if it please, you may advertise with speed Sir William Russell to have regard to these points. As also advertise (as your Honour think meetest) her Majesty's ships in the Narrow Seas.

There is a very great Hollander also in company, laden with Spanish goods. By conference with divers other of the three flyboats, I understood the said ship to be one of the company ; but sifted not the secret ; yet found by them that she was sold to the Spaniards.

I am appointed as this day to put over, if wind serve, with the Gallion Leicester in company, for the coast of France, to check¹ with this fleet. God send me the happiness to do some effectual service for my gracious mistress and country. There never happened the like opportunity to beat down the Spanish pride, if it be effectually followed. If not, I would to the Lord I had not been one of the company, for our reputations thereby is overthrown. I would I were one of the thirty sail to put it in execution.

This, I betake¹ your Honour to the Almighty, most humbly craving pardon for tedious writing. From aboard the Nonpareil, this 17th of July, 1588.

Your Honour's in all duty to command,

THOMAS FENNER.

Since my letters of the 12th to your Honour at my being at the sea, I spake with three English ships of Dartmouth, who came from Rochelle, bringing certain intelligence of the dispersion of the Spanish fleet into the Passage,² the Groyne, and divers other places thereabouts. Withal a pinnace of Rochelle, taking two of their victuallers, within two hours after met with two of the galleons with their mainmasts overboard. They reported further, that many of them were beaten with a wonderful storm in the north part of Ireland.

This present morning a little caravel of Sir Francis Drake arrived which was sent for the coast of Spain for discovery, who met with two French which came from Lisbon the 6th of this month, who confessed six of the Spanish fleet came back into Lisbon before their departure, full of sick men ; the rest of the fleet, some in Bayona, some in the Groyne and in Passage, and in great sickness and mortality. Now is the time, I beseech God move your Honour

Sir:—I find no manner of difference between winter and summer, saving that the days be now longer, and to deliver our hard water works¹ most stormy and tempestuous the same will hardly be credited to fall out such in the season.

Being informed from Calais, the 15th of this month there should come from Rosco 50 sails to join with them of Dunkirk, I laboured, as much as wind and weather would give me leave, to attend them by intercepting their shipping, which was given me to understand should repair either to Calais or Dunkirk the next day.

The 16th of this present, I observed the full tides where they might harbour themselves, but lost my labour and returned to the Downs.

The next day, the 17th of this instant, I plied up the former course and anchored between Calais Cliffs² and Blackness, where no usual road was, as it appeared after by the great storm that happened. In the interim came Gourdan's ships with two Rosco flyboats under sail, which I made strike and ride at anchor with me.

The storm arose presently most outrageous, and such as, during my [being³] aboard the seas, this winter, I never saw greater. These sails seemed deep laden, and certainly came from Lisbon, but the extremity of weather was such as I could not send any boat aboard. Yet did Gourdan, with a very nimble sail of shallop, covet to send aboard his ship; but I waved him to come unto me first, which he little regarded; whereby I was enforced to discharge a fair¹ shot over him, and so [he] came room unto me.

Upon further examination of Gourdan's men, they confessed their master's ship full freighted with merchandise at Lisbon, and so gave him leave to go aboard to work the best advantage for his master in this extremity of storm. The other two smaller vessels of Rosco which came in company, I took better care to look unto them, hoping that some of them may answer the charge of the storm which hath scattered many of our fleet, if they be well searched. This, because our navy is not yet gathered together, whereby I cannot yet advertise our fortunes, with my very loving commendations, do betake you to God. From aboard the Rainbow, the 18th of July, 1588, at anchor in the Downs, in most foul weather.

Your very loving assured friend ever,

H. SEYMOUR.

To move the Lord Treasurer.

Sir, You shall do very well to help us with a pay for our men, who are almost 16 weeks unpaid; for what with fair and foul means, I have enough to do to keep them from mutiny. Our coast men likewise would be resolved whether their pay and other necessities shall be defrayed at her Majesty's charges, as their victuals now are.

July 19.—BURGHLEY TO WALSYNGHAM.

Sir:—I find my mind as much troubled to write as now I do, as commonly my stomach is against purging¹; but I cannot conceal from you the causes which will shortly bring forth desperate effects.

I have received letters from my Lord Admiral and Mr. Hawkyns, with a schedule declaring that they have great lack of money for wages, besides victuals; for² Mr. Quarles hath 6,000*l.* this last week, and now Mr. Hawkyns' declaration that, to make a full pay to the 28th of this month, there must be paid 19,070*l.*; and of that 6,000*l.* which he had, there remaineth with him but 500*l.* I marvel that where so many are dead on the seas the pay is not dead with them, or with many of them.

And how the reckoning for victuals will fall out I know not, but I fear that 6,000*l.* will not serve; and yet, as I perceive, my Lord Admiral's company are victualled until mid August, and if Sir Francis Drake was victualled, his Lordship might go to the sea without delay. At this time also is demanded by the office of the admiralty, for to pay an old debt for provisions, 7,000*l.*; and to restore their lacks 6,000*l.*; in toto, 13,000*l.*; and I have moved them to content the creditors for the 7,000*l.* with one-third now, one other third in the end of August, and the later at Michaelmas; which is a charitable relief, and so there might [be³] leisure in paying the other 6,000*l.* for new provisions. There is also paid to Quarles for one month's victual for the ships in the Narrow Seas, 1,854*l.*

The office of the ordnance demandeth for furniture of habiliments &c., for to serve an army by land, about 8,000*l*. There is also, beside 2,700*l*. lately paid to the creditors, the sum of 2,379*l*. to be paid. I know that the towns and the army have also great need of money.

A man would wish, if peace cannot be had, that the enemy would not longer delay, but prove, as I trust, his evil fortune: for as these expeditions do consume us, so I would hope, by God's goodness, upon their defeat we might have one half year's time to provide for money.

I have had conference with Palavicino and with Saltonstall¹ how 40,000 or 50,000 might be had for 10 per cent.; but I find no probability how to get money here in specie, which is our lack, but by exchange, to have it out of the parts beyond sea, which will not be done but in a long time; yet there is some likelihood that our merchants of Stade might practise for 20,000 or 30,000, for which there shall be some profit very secretly. I shall but fill my letter with more melancholy matter if I should remember what money must be had to pay 5,000 footmen and 1,000 horsemen for defence of the enemy landing in Essex.

Yours most assured,
W. BURGHLEY.

[ccxii. 69.—Holograph. Addressed.]

Sir:—Your last received letter of the 18th of this month doth in manner answer your two former letters of the 17th of this instant; for the flat bottomed boats meant to be transported from Gravelines to Dunkirk or Nieuport, the same doth very well agree with many my letters heretofore written, declaring the Duke intent only to employ them for Wakerland¹; for otherwise they be no boats to be hazarded to the seas, no more than wherries or cockboats; and assuredly the Flushingers reinforcing their strength by sea doth confirm my opinion. I am very glad likewise that Sir William Wynter doth concur with me in judgment touching the Isle of Wight, which heretofore he did not so well regard, and which in my letters last sent unto you I remembered the same a special place for a rendezvous, wishing besides hoys instead of sconces for defence of the Thames and the City of London.² Also I mistrust Sandwich, which is a strong situation by nature.

These two places, the Isle of Wight and Sandwich, will very hardly be recovered of the enemy, being once obtained. But I fear them not this year nor the next, if her Majesty will not still be entertained with peace, but rather to proceed to intercept the India fleet which is shortly to return. This, having due regard to your last advertisements of Mr. Thomas Fenner's, do take my leave. From aboard the Rainbow, the 20th of July, 1588, returned to the Small Downs, where we may daily [espy³] any sails upon the coasts of Calais.

Your assured friend to command, the ship of Rye, the pinnace of Feversham, the fly-boat which I stayed, and five of my company in her, and two Bretons of Rosco, which I stayed in that distress, and in which one of them¹ are 6 or 7 English mariners of our fleet. These, without question, are either put to Flushing or Harwich, hoping² by the next fair weather to hear of them. The galley and the men within her, being 280³ persons, may thank God I stayed her going out at that time, for there is no question but she had perished.
H. SEYMOUR.

[ccxii. 80.—Signed, and autograph postscript. Addressed.]

Sir :—I will not trouble you with any long letter ; we are at this present otherwise occupied than with writing. Upon Friday, at Plymouth, I received intelligence that there were a great number of ships descried off of the Lizard ; whereupon, although the wind was very scant, we first warped out of harbour that night, and upon Saturday turned out very hardly, the wind being at South-West ; and about three of the clock in the afternoon, descried the Spanish fleet, and did what we could to work for the wind, which [by this] morning we had recovered, descriing their f[leet to] consist of 120 sail, whereof there are 4 g[alleasses] and many ships of great burden.

At nine of the [clock] we gave them fight, which continued until one. [In this] fight we made some of them to bear room to stop their leaks ; notwithstanding we durst not adventure to put in among them, their fleet being so strong. But there shall be nothing either neglected or unhazarded, that may work their overthrow.

Sir, the captains in her Majesty's ships have behaved themselves most bravely and like men hitherto, and I doubt not will continue, to their great commendation. And so, recommending our good success to your godly prayers, I bid you heartily farewell. From aboard the Ark, thwart of Plymouth, the 21st of July, 1588.

Your very loving friend,
C. HOWARD.

Sir, the southerly wind that brought us back from the coast of Spain brought them out. God blessed us with turning us back. Sir, for the love of God and our country, let us have with some speed some great shot sent us of all bigness; for this service will continue long; and some powder with it.

July 21.—THE MAYOR¹ OF PLYMOUTH AND MR. DARELL TO THE COUNCIL.

[ccxii. 81.—Copy. Endorsed.]

Our last intelligence² that we gave to your Lordships was that the Spanish fleet was in view of this town yesternight, and that my Lord Admiral was passed to the sea before our said view, and was out of our sight. Since which time we have certain knowledge, both by certain pinnaces come from his Lordship, as also by plain view this present morning, that my Lord being to the windwards of the enemy, are in fight, which we beheld. As for that we suppose that his Lordship will find in this action great want of men, we have thought most meet to send such forth as the town and country will yield, and in that behalf we have provided divers ships and bottoms to carry them so fast as they come. And so &c.

Right Honourable and my very good Lord :—I am commanded by my very good Lord, the Lord

² This letter is missing.

Admiral, to send you the caravel in haste with this letter, giving your Lordship to understand that the army of Spain arrived upon our coast the 20th of this present. The 21st we had them in chase, and so coming up unto them, there hath passed some cannon shot between some of our fleet and some of them, and as far as we perceive they are determined to sell their lives with blows. Whereupon his Lordship hath commanded me to write unto your Lordship and Sir William Wynter, that those ships serving under your charge should be put into the best and strongest manner you may, and ready to assist his Lordship for the better encountering of them in those parts where you now are. In the meantime, what his Lordship and the rest here following him may do shall be surely performed.

His Lordship hath commanded me to write his hearty commendations to your Lordship and Sir William Wynter. I do salute your Lordship, Sir William Wynter, Sir Henry Palmer, and all the rest of those honourable gentlemen serving under you with the like ; beseeching God of his mercy to give her Majesty, our gracious sovereign, always victory against her enemies. Written aboard her Majesty's good ship the Revenge, off of Start, the 21st, late in the evening, 1588.

 ready to be commanded,
 FRA. DRAKE.

This letter, my honourable good Lord, is sent in haste. The fleet of Spaniards is somewhat above a hundred sails, many great ships ; but truly, I think not half of them men-of-war. Haste.

Your Lordship's assured,
 FRA. DRAKE.

July 22.—JOHN POPHAM¹ TO WALSYNGHAM.

[ccxiii. 1.—Holograph.² Addressed.]

My duty unto your Honour most humbly remembered :—It may please you to understand that upon Friday last the Spanish fleet was discovered towards the west parts, and upon Saturday they were all, to the number of eight score and two sail, over against Falmouth ; and yesterday, being more easterly, towards Dartmouth. I am advertised from my Lord Chief Justice Anderson³ that my Lord Admiral continued in fight with them from nine of the clock in the forenoon until three in the afternoon, and the Spanish fleet is said to endeavour themselves what they can towards the east. Whereupon my Lord Chief Justice hath written unto me to understand my opinion what were fit to be done touching our journey towards Ireland, whither we resolved to take our voyage upon Monday next in the morning, and do so resolve still, unless we receive contrary directions from your Honour. And for my Lord Chief Justice's better satisfaction therein, I have thought good with all expedition to despatch this bearer, Cottrel, my servant, to your Honour to receive your directions whether it shall be convenient for us to hold on our journey, or otherwise to make stay thereof until her Majesty's pleasure be further known in that behalf ; which I pray your Honour I may be advertised of by this bearer, so as it may be with me here by Sunday next. My Lord Chief Justice doth advertise me that the course towards Ireland is very full of pirates, in respect whereof he saith it behoveth us to pursue somewhat strongly.

I have herewithal sent unto your Honour a letter¹ written out of St. Sebastian by one Redbird, of the date of the 18th of this July,² by their account. It came from St. John de Luz, whither it was conveyed by the same Redbird the 12th of this July, by our account. The bark that brought it to Bridgwater arrived there the 21st of this July, and upon Wednesday last discovered the most part of the Spanish navy 25 leagues west the headland of France, holding their course towards England.

With the same letter this other note³ enclosed was sent. The man I take to be honest, and your Honour can best discern what good is to be collected by the knowledge of what is comprised in them. But with your favour I may write thus much : that these forces of themselves are not fit, as I think, to enter England until they adjoin themselves to greater aids ; and whatsoever the forces were (with good assistance) they are not to be doubted, the country I find everywhere so readily and willingly.

I beseech⁴ God, her Majesty, in this so dangerous a time, may, with the good advice of my Lords, have a special care of herself ; which being had, we have such an united strength through her Highness, as her enemies, being never so many, they can never prevail against so gracious a Queen. I beseech⁴ you, Sir, to pardon me, in that the abundance of my loyalty and dutiful affection to her

July 22.—DARELL TO BURGHLEY.

My duty unto your Honour most humbly remembered :—I did receive yesterday a letter from your Lordship with direction to provide a month's victual for 1,340 men serving under my Lord Admiral in the ships of London, who are already victualled by the city but till the 10th of August ; and that the city will allow for the same after the rate of 14s. a man, as her Majesty doth ; which money, how it may best be conveyed hither, your Lordship doth refer unto me.

The month's victual shall be prepared in a readiness for them, God willing, in due time ; and for the money, I wish them of London to deal with some merchant of Exeter for delivery of it there by exchange ; a course most easy for them and very convenient for me, in that I do make sundry provisions in places near thereabouts. If any of the coast towns that have set forth ships in this service shall require, in like sort, to have them victualled here, it shall be also performed according to your Lordship's commandment.

Your Honour writeth¹ that the note I sent last of the number of ships and men in service under my Lord Admiral did seem very unperfect, and disagreeable from my former presentments; and therefore your Lordship requireth to be further certified thereof in some more plain and direct sort than before. It may please your Lordship, I trust it hath been and always shall be most far from me to abuse your Honour with any untrue information. I might well omit the setting down of some ships and men with whom, being not set forth at her Majesty's charge, I had not to do; but I do greatly hope your Honour shall not find I have erred wittingly in any material point concerning the charge committed here unto me. And therefore, until by proof the contrary shall appear, I do most humbly beseech your Lordship not to condemn me.

I do now send unto your Lordship herewith two several notes¹: the one importing the state of the whole navy, both for the number of ships and men, according to the allowance given, as also for the time of their victualling, which is now reduced to end all together, in all the ships at her Majesty's charge, upon the 10th of August. Only the haste of my Lord Admiral was such in his setting forth upon Saturday morning, by reason he had then received some intelligence of the Spanish fleet, as that divers of his ships had not leisure to receive the full of their last proportions. And the other note containeth an estimate what money will remain of the last warrant towards the victualling of the 7,079 men now at her Majesty's charge from the 10th of August forwards. In both which notes I have not (I hope) set down anything but what your Lordship shall find to be true.

men to a mess, and also by the mortality which hath been indeed amongst them, as your Lordship writeth,—what in all this time it hath amounted unto, the captain and officers of every ship do only know, who (that notwithstanding) have been from time to time furnished by me with their due proportions, as if that had not been. Only, by that means, they have all in them a store, which no doubt will serve them a good time after their ordinary victualling be expired. And yet this sparing hath been only at such times when there hath been fear of want; otherwise the mariners will hardly endure to be abridged of any part of their allowances.

I did become a suitor unto your Honour and the rest of the Council, for nine hundred pounds which is owing upon my former reckoning; which it pleased you, by your next letters, to promise me should be sent hither soon after. I do humbly beseech your Honour to have the same in remembrance; and in the meantime I will presume to disburse so much out of this last money granted, because I know it is not your pleasure the country shall be unpaid. And so I humbly take my leave, beseeching God to send your Lordship long life with increase of much honour. From Plymouth, this 22nd of July, 1588.

Your Honour's most humble,

MAR. DAREIL.

 C. HOWARD.

The ships you send shall find me East-North-East, following the Spanish fleet.

Since the making up of my letter there is a galleass of the enemy's taken with 450 men in her; and yesterday I spoiled one of their greatest ships, that they were fain to forsake it.

I pray your Lordship send her Majesty word hereof with speed, as from me. The captain's name is, as I hear say, Don Pedro de Alva, general of the field.

The messenger saith that there is an hundred gentlemen in the galleass which was taken, who for the most part were noblemen's sons.

July 23.—SEYMOUR TO THE COUNCIL.

[ccxiii. 12.—Signed. Addressed.]

May it please your Lordships :—I mean not to trouble you with many lines, because I do send your Lordships the original, Sir Francis Drake's letter,¹ by the which you shall understand the state of the Spanish army, how forward they be ; and to² our opinions here, we conjecture still their purpose may be to land in the Isle of Wight, to recover³ the same—which God forbid. Thus humbly praying your Lordships to send us powder and shot forthwith, whereof we have want in our fleet, and which I have divers times given knowledge thereof, I humbly take my leave. From aboard the Rainbow, at anchor a quarter seas over against Dover, the 23rd of July, 1588, at 11 of the clock at night.

Our victuals do end the last of this month ; yet upon extremity, now we know the enemy at hand, we will prolong that little we have as long as we can.

Your Lordships' humbly to command,
H. SEYMOUR.

I do send forthwith to the fleets of Zealand and Holland, to wish⁴ them to repair unto us. Also I have made the Lieutenant of Dover acquainted therewith, to the end he may have a better care thereof.

Right Honourable, my duty remembered, &c. :—
Presently after your Honour gave me license to follow my Lord Admiral, with all expedition I followed the fleet; whereas² presently Sir Francis Drake requested him I might go in the Revenge, where Sir Francis hath now found all to be of most truth, that I advertised your Honour at my coming out of Spain. And for that I do know he doth write your Honour of that we past with the Spanish fleet the 21st, and this day, 23rd of July, as well of the fights, as the taking of the gallega wherein was Don Pedro de Valdes, who is third person in this army of the Duke, and Juan Martinez de Recalde, vice-admiral, I do think it not needful to repeat. Neither of the other ship which we have also of theirs, who spoiled herself with her powder. Both of them, so Don Pedro saith, are of their principal ships. Of that we found aboard them, I refer me to Sir Francis, assuring your Honour they are not in such good order in their putting themself in battle³; but aboard they have as much evil⁴ order, as I did see, who by Sir Francis' commandment was the first went to them. They have reported to me they are now left a hundred and fifty sail, divided, as I do see, twelve in squadron, and do keep such excellent good order in their fight,¹ that if God do not miraculously work, we shall have wherein to employ ourself for some days.

The desire I have to do my duty unto your Honour hath emboldened me to do this. If I may have your Honour's license, from time to time as we do proceed in this action, I will show myself of no inferior to any, in hope to serve your Honour; most humbly beseeching your Honour to have your obedient servant in remembrance, so that I be not the first and only man denied that hath put himself unto your Honour's protection, but that there may be consideration of the long time I was prisoner for a spy, for writing the letters to London that came to your Honour's hands; which being proved, could not I have² release but with great expenses and bribes; as also the three months I spent in riding to most ports where this army was made, whereof I have given true relation unto your Honour; anything that your Honour shall think convenient for me, either in England or Ireland,³ I shall willingly receive wherewithal, and my person to serve your Honour wheresoever it shall please your Honour to use⁴ of me; assuring myself God will give me grace to do my duty towards your Honour, for whose long life and increase of honour I daily do and will pray for. *July 24.—REQUISITION FOR POWDER

[ccxiii. 59, I.—Copy.]

Whereas I have received letters from the Right Honourable the Lord High Admiral of England, advertising unto me that his Lordship hath taken two great carracks or ships from the enemy, sent to the shore, wherein is great store of powder and shot in either of them; and requireth that all the said powder and shot be sent unto his Lordship with all possible expedition, for that the state of the realm dependeth upon the present supply of such wants:— These are therefore, in her Majesty's name, straitly to charge and command you, forthwith, upon receipt hereof, you make diligent enquiry to what place the said carracks or ships are gone; and if they shall arrive near you, to cause the said powder and shot to be conveyed to his Lordship with all good speed; further charging and commanding you to take the like order by giving intelligence hereof from port to port, until his Lordship's command shall be therein performed. Whereof fail you not upon your allegiance. Weymouth and Melcombe Regis, this 24th of July, 1588.

[ccxiii. 19. Holograph. Italian. Addressed.]

Right Honourable:—If I err, I beseech your Honour to pardon me and to be a mean that her Majesty and the rest of the Lords may likewise pardon me—especially my very good Lord, the Earl of Leicester, to whom I was a suitor to serve a-land under his charge. But the greatness of my zeal, which desireth to be amongst those who do fight for her Majesty's service and for the defence of her kingdom, doth constrain me, with an honourable company, to depart as this night toward Portsmouth, there to embark and join the Lord Admiral, where I hope to be present in the battle, and thereby a partaker in the victory or to win an honourable

July 25.—LEICESTER TO WALSYNGHAM.

[ccxiii. 27.—Holograph. Addressed.]

Mr. Secretary:—We have here news commonly spread abroad that my Lord Admiral hath taken either admiral or vice-admiral and the great galleass, besides one great ship sunk. The Almighty God be praised therefor, and to give further victory, to his glory and the comfort of his poor church, as no doubt it must be, with the greatest renown and perpetual fame to her Majesty that ever came to any prince. And this being true,¹ I would gladly know what her Majesty will do with me. I have here now assembled in camp 4,000 footmen, as gallant and as willing men as ever was seen: with the horse yet only of this shire. The lying in camp will do them much good, though it be but for a short time: and in my poor opinion, not good to dismiss them over suddenly, though the fleet be defeated, till ye see a little also what Parma will do. I am here cook, eater and hunt²; for as³ I myself have not only set the men a-work here about the forts, and was present among them all the first day, but also did peruse⁴ and made choice of the ground fittest for the encamping of the soldiers: and yesterday went to Chelmsford, to take order for the bringing of all the soldiers hither this day ; and this day came with the most part of them hither by 10 a-clock this morning, with very good provision for them, through the care and diligence of sundry the justices of peace here, which hath deserved great thanks, if their pains had been seen to ¹ others as to ¹ me. But if the news be true of this good beginning, which ² I cannot but suspend till I hear from you, and be sorry that all men shall receive them before myself, yet I pray you be not forgetful to resolve what shall be done here, and let me know it as soon as may be, for many respects.

I assure you I am angry with Sir John Norreys ³ and Sir Roger Williams. They were both appointed by mine own ⁴ desire, as well as otherwise, to offices of great charge ; Mr. Norreys, as marshal of our companies, the other of the horsemen. Sir John, at his arrival yesterday morning at 3 a-clock, told me that in respect of ⁵ the Spanish fleet were passed hitherward and not impeached, as now we hear it is, he was willed to go to Dover to see if the Lord Admirall did pass that way, to relieve him with men and to assemble the forces there ; which I did like very well, albeit altogether without anybody to

² My belief in which.

³ Second son of Lord Norrey, and grandson of Sir Henry Norrey, executed on a charge of adultery with Anne Boleyn. He had served with great distinction in command of English volunteers in the Low Countries, afterwards in Ireland, and again in the Low Countries under Leicester, who employed a special letter for him, probably because he was a competent soldier, which Leicester was not. The letter had been patched up by Walsingham's good offices, but it was evidently from this letter, the recommendation was very hollow. In the next year Norreys was with Dudley in a command of the expedition to Portugal. He was afterwards Lord General in the Low Countries, and, later on, in Ireland, where he died in 1597.

⁴ Myself, I mean.

⁵ I mean that the Spanish fleet supply his place, being marshal; but for a day or two content to travail the more myself as I have done; willing him and Sir Roger Williams both in any wise to return this day early to me again, for that all our forces would be assembled at the place for our camp; which they promised faithfully, especially Sir John Norreys. But yet neither of them both do I hear of, myself returning this morning with most of our men; nor anybody to order the camp, either for horse or foot, but only Edmund Yorke¹ and myself. Which manner of dealing, I assure you, doth much mislike me in them both; for, except my Lords of the Council did give Sir John such special order, as he saith, to go to Dover, I am ill used, having so many men to take charge of, and not one officer here, but only my cousin Leighton² and myself; and that the country must now needs see me so hardly accompanied as I am; for it is now 4 a-clock, but hears not of them. If they come not this night, I assure you, for my part, I will not receive any of them into office, nor bear such loose careless dealing at their hands. If you saw how weakly I am assisted, you would be sorry to think that we here should be the front against the enemy, that is so mighty, if he should land here. But I see the mighty God doth behold his little flock, and will do all things to his glory, not regarding our sins. And seeing her Majesty hath appointed me her Lieutenant-General, and numbers of men to govern, and officers accordingly, I look³ that respect to be used toward me that is due to my place.

I am herein somewhat to entreat you to consider

³ Look for

of this service, and albeit her Majesty hath summoned all her Lords to attend her person, yet were it meet in so great a conference as this is, wherein her surety and the whole realm doth consist, that as much countenance as may be, be given thereto. Among other, though he be no man of war, yet I find the country doth much respect and love him, especially that he is a true faithful subject to her Majesty and known to be zealous in religion. His presence with me would do much good. It is my Lord Rich,¹ whom I pray you send back, with her Majesty's good liking to me. You have all the rest of [the]² nobility and their forces; and if you could procure my Lord Wentworth's³ coming also, I would think they should well further this service.

Even as I had written thus much, being 5 a'clock, I received this letter⁴ from Mr. Norreys. You will see whether there be such necessity of his special journey for that he writeth of, but I could have directed by my letters to the lieutenants there. But surely, Mr. Secretary, he makes me conceive that there is other matter in it, that having an honourable place under me and no authority elsewhere, for aught I know, more than as a supervising muster master, should deliver himself thus from me to command apart, without commission, rather than with me, in the honourable place appointed him.

² Omitted in MS.

³ Thomas, and Lord Wentworth, was deputy of Calais when it was taken by the French in 1558. For that loss he was tried and acquitted. He sat as one of the judges of the Duke of Norfolk in 1572 and of the Queen of Scots in 1579. He died in 1593.

⁴ Misim.

And where¹ he promised faithfully to be here with me this morning early, it appears by his letter that he means to stay longer to receive my further opinion. Before God, I am much troubled with this dealing; you knowing how well I have dealt with him since our reconciliation. But I pray you judge evenly whether this be not cause to think strangely of his doings, to leave me thus to myself, being my principal officer. If my Lords did appoint him to this, I must say they do me the more wrong, to alter and change in these cases without acquainting me with the matter. And albeit I do complain to you in this matter, yet mean I not but to use it well, and hear what he can say; but that I must deal frankly with you, for you were a doer between us, and this is a time you know for all officers under me to show their care and love, if the matter were of less moment. I have little backing or countenance enough beside, and therefore we ought to join the better together in so needful a service. And so, with my paper, at this time to end my letter. In hot haste going to our camp again, this 25th of July.

Your assured,

R. LEYCESTER.

July 25. - SEYMOUR TO WALSINGHAM.

[ccxiii. 30.—Holograph. Addressed.]

Sir:—I am most glad of this most happy beginning of victory obtained of her Majesty's enemies, but most sorry I am so tied I cannot be an actor in the play. But if the Duke be as good as his threats, he will now show his courage, for hitherto he hath only played with surprises of towns.

more undirectly than directly. I pray God it may be my fortune to light upon himself, the same being so given out, but I fear me this matter will daunt him.

We are here very carefully cared for by Sir John Norreys, for munition, men, and powder, which is not yet come unto us. In the mean [time]¹ we are assisted with the presence of worthy gentlemen that are of purpose come to serve her Majesty with the venture of their lives; which I thought necessary to acquaint you therewith, to the end her Majesty may give them thanks. Their names be Sir Charles Blount,² Francis Carey,³ Richard Lee,⁴ Brute Brown.⁵

² Second son of the 6th Lord Mountjoy, born in 1563. On coming to the Court in 1583, his good looks attracted the Queen's notice and won for him her favour. He is described as then 'of a brown hair, a sweet face, a most neat composure, and tall in his person.' He was knighted by Leicester for service in the Low Countries in 1587, and succeeded as 8th Lord Mountjoy on the death of his elder brother in 1594. He commanded the Lion at Cadiz in 1596, and the land forces, under Essex, in the Islands' Voyage in 1597. In 1600 he was appointed Lord Deputy of Ireland, and Lord-Lieutenant in 1603, when he was created Earl of Devonshire. Died in 1606, leaving no legitimate issue, but several children by Lady Rich (see ante, p. 308), whom he afterwards married.

³ The spelling of the name is uncertain, and there is no other mention of him. He may have been a son of Sir Francis Carew, then in command of the Surrey militia (ccxvii. 75). It does not appear that he was any relation of Lord Hunsdon, whose youngest son, Robert, joined the E. Bonaventure with the Earl of Cumberland (Memoirs, ed. 1759, p. 18).

⁴ He may have been a younger cousin of Sir Henry Lee, afterwards Master of the Ordnance; or the name may have been Leigh. It is impossible to identify him.

⁵ Brute seems to have been a common Christian name in a family of Browns of Tavistock. The parish register shows the birth of John son of Brute Brown in 1616; also the burial of Brute son of Brute Brown in 1620. This particular Brute Brown was probably the man slain by a great shot at Porto Rico in 1595, as he was sitting at supper with Drake, who, as he started up, exclaimed, 'Ah! dear Brute, I could grieve for thee, but now is no time for me to let down my spirits.'

Thus preparing myself for the service, do commit you to God. From aboard the Rainbow, a pretty way in the sea, in Dover Road, but shifting further forth, the 25th of July, 1588.

Your assured friend &c.

Right Honourable:—According to your Honour's commandment by your last letters I have informed myself of the price of all sort of armours here in Middelburg, which differeth something from that it is worth in Holland, being somewhat better cheap there than here, but not much. The musket with the band-roll and rest, 22s. sterling; the caliver and furniture, 12s. and 13s. sterling. The horseman's armour complete, with cuissants, the breast petronell proof, and the backpiece proof, 3*l.* and 3*l.* 6s. 8*d.* sterling. There is one Finch² that hath bought 30 for Sir Thomas Heneage at 3*l.* sterling the piece; but since they are grown dearer, for that he bespake them a good while ago. Powder is here at 4*l.* 10s. sterling the quintal, which is a hundredweight. In England is 8*l.* more than this. There is no great quantity to be had here; but the greatest store that is for these countries is in Amsterdam. By some of our merchants I do understand that there is good quantity at Hamburg and Stade,³ and better cheap than in these parts. . . .

We understand here that the great galley which the enemy hath made at Sluys, going out before the last tempest, was forced to put in to the Texel, wherein there is a hundred Italian soldiers and 200 forçats.⁴ Yesternight here arrived a drum from the

They of Enkhuysen have of late taken a Scots pirate who had 94 men aboard of him and 25 pieces of ordnance. It is thought that they will execute most part of the men. I have, since my last to your Honour, spoken to Monsr. de St. Aldegonde,¹ who telleth me that he can do nothing with the Count Maurice, and that he is altogether led by Villiers the marshal, Monsr. de Famars,² and Villiers the preacher. By reason of my sickness which hath held me long, I could not as yet go into Holland, but I sent my despatches to Mr. Kyllgrew, of whom I have answer that he had received the same, and since that time I have received letters from him, by the which he writeth me that the Count Maurice would have me to come, which I will not fail to do, as soon as it shall please God to send me health. I find St. Aldegonde to be in a very bare estate, and was resolved if the Princess³ had gone in France, to have gone with her, and to have presented his service to the King of Navarre. Her stay is the cause of his. He desired me to write to your Honour to know your Honour's advice whether he should proceed in this determination of himself, since that now the Princess doth not go, but findeth many difficulties. Among the rest, the lightness and unconstance of that nation; want of means to provide himself for such a journey; the small means that the King hath now in this time to do for him.

This last tempest forced all the ships of war of these countries, that lay before Dunkirk and Nieuport, to come in. The like hath not been seen by any at this time of the year. But this day it is thought they will all go forth again. The corn of this island is in danger to be spoiled by reason of the great store of rain that is fallen of late.

By others I know your Honour shall be advertised of the pacifying of the mutiny in Gertruidenberg.¹ The States, they have paid their money; assurance they have none but the honesty of the mutineers. They have railed very much against all the States, especially against Barneveldt, whom they name Barrabas, and Brasser of Delft. They advised Count Maurice, who lay before the town, to take heed of them all, and that they would betray him as they had done his father. Sir John Wingfeild² they have been content to accept for their governor. Herewith I send your Honour a packet which I received yesternight from Mr. Kyllgrew, with my most humble duty; and as I am bound, I beseech the Almighty long to bless and preserve your Honour. [ccxiii. 36.—Signed. Endorsed.]

Right Honourable :—Having according to the tenor of your Lordships' late letters signified your Honours' pleasures unto the deputy lieutenants of Dorset for the present dispatch and sending of one thousand men to be employed in Essex, do find by answer returned from the said deputies that the strength of that county, being of itself very small, to be thereby greatly weakened and the present state thereof to require all places of danger to remain fortified, having the enemy so near them at sea and in sight, as besides, advertisement being given them of the great preparations of the French, likewise ready to put to the sea in assistance of the Spaniard. There is already drawn out of the said county, by warrant from the Lord Admiral, for his better supply, 400 men. With all which I have thought it my part to acquaint your good Lordships, leaving the same to your Honours' considerations, humbly praying your further pleasures to be returned touching the said 1,000 men so required, to be either supplied out of Wilts, Somerset, or Devon, or otherwise to be stayed at home for the present guard of that county, for the causes before alleged. And even so do leave your good Lordships to the tuition of the Almighty. Basing, this 26th of July, 1588.

Mr. Secretary :—The 4,000 men of Essex are all come together and lodged here together at West Tilbury upon a very good ground for aptness for the defence of this coast. They be as forward men and all willing to meet with the enemy as ever I saw. Some want, their captains showed in themselves, that being suddenly removed to this place, brought not so much as one meal's provision of victual with them, so that at their arrival here there was not a barrel of beer nor loaf of bread for them. Enough after 20 miles' march to have been discouraged and to have mutinied, but all with one voice, finding it to be the speediness of their coming, said they would abide more hunger than this to serve her Majesty and the country.

I did send to have Robert Arderne¹ come down and to bring a hundred tuns of beer, and to be here this day ; but I hear not of him yet, and if he fail it will be the greater ill hap, seeing all this part, on this side and the other, within 4 miles of the water, cannot yield drink enough for them. And for that I hear the 1,000 men from London will be here this night also, I have sent presently to stay them till we may provide for them here, except they have provision with them.

And touching the resolution of my Lords for their captains to continue their leadership I am sorry for it ; because it must now light upon me, their displacing ; but rather than I will let her Majesty's safety and the whole realm's service, I would displace my brother or any man. As for the account of the regiments, I do yet scarcely see how I shall bring it to pass without getting other manner of persons than goldsmiths and mercers are ; and yet if it may be so there is not place for half such captains as so great a service requires. And for that it hath pleased God to begin graciously with us and to give hope of comfortable victory, yet let us not be too secure when the substance of their forces remain yet whole, and being so resolutely bent as they be ; but that we continue our defensive preparations, rather more than less, against them.

And because I see and find many causes now to increase my former opinion of the dilatory wants you shall find upon all sudden hurly-burleys, for which respect I am in duty bound to move her Majesty and humbly to beseech her, that as these cases that touch her honour, life, and state, that there may be such due regard had for all provisions as in times past hath been. But in no former time was ever so great cause as at this time. And albeit her Majesty hath appointed on shore an army to resist her enemies if they land, yet how hard a matter it will be to gather the men together, I find it ; and may judge, if it will be 5 days to gather the very countrymen,¹ what will it be and must be to look in short space for those that dwell 40, 50 and 60 miles off ; and this must be warning that considerations of victuals as well as anything else be provided at the place of assemblies &c. I did two whole days before the coming of these make proclamation in all market towns for victuallers to come to the place where the soldiers² should encamp, and to receive ready money for it ; but there is not one victualler come in to this hour. I have sent to all the justices about it from place to place; but I speak it to this end, that timely consideration is to be had of all these things, and not to defer and put off in hope, till the worse come and the time do¹ overpass.

And that it may please her Majesty, of her princely magnanimity, now above all other former times, to show herself careful and provident not only for her own person, which is the stay of us all, but also of all her whole realm and people, whom God hath committed to her protection. And were she secured, and all about her did counsel her to have presently a convenient force both of horse and foot about her, that she will not defer the time upon any supposed hope both to assemble them in time, and to appoint some special nobleman about her to govern and direct them; for her Majesty cannot be strong enough too soon; and if her navy had not been strong and abroad, as it is, whatsoever cost hath been bestowed, what case had herself and her whole realm been in by this time? Or if God do¹ not miraculously give her victory there, what case will she be in, if her forces be not, not only assembled, but an army perfectly dressed, with all the officers appertaining, to withstand that mighty enemy that is to approach then her gates? I pray you, Mr. Secretary, with humble pardon, deliver thus much to her Majesty; for God doth know I speak it not to bring you to charges. I would she had less cause to spend than ever she had, and her coffers fuller than they be; but I will prefer her life and safety, and the defence of the realm, before all sparing and charges, being in the present danger it is in.

There is a portion of money appointed I perceive to the charge of Sir Moyle Finch² to be [ccxiii. 39.—Holograph. Addressed :—For her Majesty's affairs.]

Mr. Secretary :—After the writing of my other letters, here is arrived Sir Roger Williams, and perceive Mr. Norreys will be this night with me. In the meanwhile, they have put me to more travail than ever I was in before. I perceive by Sir Roger, that my Lord Henry Seymour is departed toward Rye, to assist my Lord Admiral, but doth want both men and powder. Good Lord, how is this come to pass, that both he and my Lord Admiral is so weakened of their men? I hear their men be run away, which must be severely punished, or else all soldiers will be bold. He saith also that the Prince¹ is looked to issue out presently. He hath suffered no stranger this seven or eight days to come to him, or to see his army and ships, but he hath blindfolded them.

I beseech you assemble your forces, and play not away this kingdom by delays, and hasten our Moyle of Eastwell. He was, at this time, officially styled 'Treasurer at Wars.' He married Elizabeth, daughter and heiress of Sir Thomas Heneage, Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, Vice-Chamberlain of the Household, and one of the Lords of the Council.

horsemen hither and footmen, if you hear not that the fleet¹ is scattered or beaten; for surely if they come to the Narrow Seas, the Prince will play another manner of part than is looked for. I have written enough already. God send care with expedition with you there, and good success with us here; specially with our sea forces. In all haste, 26th of July.

Yours assured,

[ccxiii. 40.—Signed. Addressed.]

It may please your Honour:—I received a letter this day at two of the clock in the morning from Sir George Carey, the copy whereof I have sent unto your Honour herein enclosed, and also a letter from my Lord Admiral, which I received at six of the clock this morning, wherein he writeth for powder and shot, and saith he hath very great want thereof, by reason of three great fights which he hath had with the Spanish fleet. Whereupon I have sent him so much as that I have altogether unfurnished myself, as may appear by a note to your Honour herein sent; which I shall desire your Honour to be a mean that it may be supplied, for that I shall have great want thereof if any attempt be offered. And so, hoping in my next letters to send your Honour some certain news of good success, I commit your Honour to God. From Portsmouth the 26th of July, 1588.

Your Honour's to his power,

Postscript.—I have considered of the proportion of powder and shot which is to come from the Tower, which is but five last of powder; and if I shall take out (as I must of force) so much as I have sent unto my Lord Admiral, there would none be left. Wherefore it were very requisite that there should be more sent hither, or into some place in Sussex where my Lord Admiral is like to come, or might have knowledge of it; for else it will be wanting.

July 25.—SIR GEORGE CAREY TO SUSSEX.

[ccxiii. 43.—Vera Copia. Endorsed.]

May it please your Lordship to understand that, finding by yours the copy and direction of the Lords' letters for supplying the Lord Admiral's wants, touching that, I have thus far proceeded. Two days since I sent his Lordship 4 ships and a pinnace sufficiently furnished with mariners and soldiers; from whom I have not yet heard any news; but sending yesterday another pinnace unto him with an hundred men, he returned them unto me this afternoon with great thanks, willing the captain to tell me that he had as many men as he desired or could well use. For your Lordship's news I humbly thank you.

This morning began a great fight betwixt both fleets, south of this island 6 leagues,¹ which continued from five of the clock until ten, with so great expense of powder and bullet, that during the said time the shot continued so thick together that it might rather have been judged a skirmish with small shot on land than a fight with great shot on sea. In which conflict, thanks be to God, there hath not been two of our men hurt

The news in the fleet are my Lord Harry Seymour is hardly laid unto by the Dunkirkers, and that Scilla² is taken by the French or the Spanish.

The fleets keep the direct trade³ and shot into the sea out of our sight by three of the clock this afternoon ; whereupon we have dissolved our camp wherein we have continued since Monday. And so praying your Lordship to send this enclosed by the post, I humbly commit you to God. From Carisbrooke Castle, this 25th of July, at 8 hours in the night. Your Lordship's to command,

GEORGE CAREY.

If it may please your Honour, as I do understand, my Lord Admiral could be content to have some supply of ships and men at this time. If it be so, your Honour shall hear my poor opinion: that is, there may be within this 4 days near 30 sail of serviceable merchant ships ready to set sail, who are so furnished with ordnance and artillery of their own that some small supply beside will suffice. As for their men, they have 20 men a-piece, which they now brought home with them; I mean those ships that be come from Stade now. As for victuals,³ if the victualler³ can provide for them in so small a time, he may be commanded with all expedition to do it for some 14 days or three weeks; if they shall tarry longer, they may have some more provided to send after them. Our humble duties to your Honour remembered:—Whereas the Roebuck hath brought into Torbay one of the Spanish fleet, Jacob Whiddon being captain of the said Roebuck, and these two gentlemen appointed by Sir Francis Drake for the conducting of the said Spanish ship into some safe harbour, but the present necessity of her Majesty's service so requiring for the speedy dispatch of the said Roebuck again to her Highness' navy, they have requested us to take the care for the safe harbouring of the said ship; which, by God's grace, we will take so good care of as possible we may.

There is also taken out of the said ship one piece of ordnance for the better furnishing of a ship to join with the navy, wherewith we hope your Honour and the rest of my Lords will not dislike. We have also sent to the seas all the shipping and mariners in all our county, to be employed as my Lord High Admiral shall appoint. And touching the ordnance and the residue of the goods that do remain in the said ship, there shall be a true and perfect inventory made, and the goods laid in safety as soon as the same shall be brought into Dartmouth, which we will forthwith do our best endeavours to perform; and so acquaint your Honour and the rest of my Lords with the particularities thereof. July 27.—SIR JOHN GILBERTE AND GEORGE CARY TO THE COUNCIL.

Our humble duties to your good Lordships :—Whereas there is one of the Spanish fleet brought into Torbay (as your Honours have been heretofore advertised of), in which ship there is almost four hundred soldiers and mariners, all which for divers respects we have taken out of the ship and brought them under safe guard unto the shore, some 20 or 30 mariners only excepted, which we have left in the said ship to be the better help to bring the said ship into safe harbour,¹ being at this present, through the occasion of her Majesty's service, great want of mariners of our own country.

If it may so stand with your Lordships' pleasure, we desire to know your resolutions, what shall become of these people, our vowed enemies. The charge of keeping of them is great, the peril greater, and the discontentment [of]² our country greatest of all, that a nation so much disliking unto them should remain amongst them. To her Majesty's commandment and your Honours' direction we refer this action, and likewise ourselves. Eftsoons praying your Lordships' resolved determinations, we are thus bold, under your Lordships' correction, to give them their maintenance, touching¹ their sustenance of such provision as remaineth in the said ship.

There is one thing more that giveth us occasion to desire your Lordships' direction, for that the French King (as your Honours well know) being entered into the Holy League (as they term it) and vowed the extirpation of all others which are of the contrary, there are yet² divers French boats and vessels, that under pretence of transporting of passengers and other things, come into our ports and creeks. We greatly suspect and are much afraid lest their coming be rather to give intelligence, and understand her Majesty's proceedings in these perilous times; and therefore do humbly pray your Lordships' directions herein, where³ we shall stay them, or otherwise give them leave in peaceable manner to depart. And so very humbly take our leave from further troubling your Lordships. From Torbay this 27th of July, 1588.

Mr. Carew Raleigh⁴ hath requested us to move your good Lordships that it would please you to give him warrant for some six pieces of ordnance which are in this Spanish ship to be placed in her Majesty's fort or castle of Portland, for the better strength thereof; for that your Honours (as he saith) hath been heretofore informed of the want of artillery which is to be required for the defence of the said castle.

July 27.—SEYMOUR TO THE COUNCIL.

[ccxiii. 50.—Signed. Addressed.]

May it please your Lordships :—I have received three letters in a packet of the 25th of this month, and with the same a single letter of the same date from Mr. Secretary, wherein is signified that by reason of advertisement that came after the making up of the packet from the Lord Admiral, her Majesty's pleasure was, notwithstanding all former directions from your Lordships, I should bend myself to stop the issuing of the forces of the Duke of Parma from Dunkirk. How easily ¹ the lying of our ships against Gravelines, much more Dunkirk, I can say no more than I have many times written. But seeing it is her Majesty's pleasure we will endeavour to perform it as near as wind and weather will give us leave.

Our victualling doth end the last of this month ; and for that your Lordships, by your writing, do reckon the galley to be in the Thames mouth for the guarding of the river, I have therefore taken order for Mr. Borough in the galley for the Thames, and [this] ² was the only cause of the saving her and all the men's lives the last great storm.

I have besides to signify unto your Lordships that our fleet being from the first promised to be 78 sail, there was never yet, when the same was most, 36 ; and now we have not above 20 ; and of them, of her Majesty's shipping, as I have always written, but 8 sails besides pinnaces ; and for the coast men, I think¹ more than the hoys of Ipswich, the ships of Dover and Sandwich, the ships of Yarmouth and Lynn; few also of the coast that were set down for service,² little available. So giving your Lordships to understand that the Hollanders are not with us, and that I think they desire more to regard more their own coast than ours, do humbly take my leave. From aboard the Rainbow, the 27th of July, 1588, at anchor in the Downs.

I have also seen by experience, which I have likewise advertised, that our merchants' ships are not able to abide that stress upon these coasts which her Majesty's are able to endure, which is to be considered of.

Your Lordships' humble to command,
H. SEYMOUR.

So long as the wind holdeth West-South-West, your Lordships may not look to have us on the other coasts, neither can the enemy come out.

To make it more plain to your Lordships :—

Whensoever we ride upon the other coasts, if the wind come without the land our merchants' ships are enforced to forsake us, as not able to ride; so that our trust for this service is only upon her Majesty's ships, in number 8, besides pinnaces, which are not able to ride it out. I am driven to write this much, because, in my former letters,³ your Lordships, having many matters, do forget them.

² 'And those' is perhaps omitted.

July 27.—WYNTER TO WALSYNGHAM.

[ccxiii. 49.—Signed. Addressed.]

Your Honour's letter of the 25th of this present I received this last night at 12 of the clock, being then within 4 miles of Calais, and according to your Honour's commandment I have dealt with Mr. Borough, who is most ready to obey your Honour's commandment, and will, I dare undertake, most faithfully perform it. The long staying to the westwards of the King of Spain's army, which might have been here 4 days past if they had been disposed to have come so low, doth confirm the opinion which I have held that their intention is to surprise Portsmouth and to possess the Isle of Wight; for if that were had, in my poor conceit¹ it were the only degree² to bring to pass their desires. And truly, I have ever loved and honoured my Lord Admiral; but now, in respect of the wise and honourable carriage of himself in preventing of the army, that they gain not that place which, I do assure myself, is the only thing that they hunger for, doth double my service towards him; and under your Honour's correction, speaking as to my honourable good friend, I do not think it wisdom nor discretion for my Lord with his army to put it to a journey,³ for that were the hazarding of all. Sir, these huge ships that are in the Spanish army shall have but a bad place to rest in, if they come so low as to the eastward of Portsmouth.

And now, Sir, you must look to the Thames mouth, which you may easily do by placing of shipping at the Nore-head; which will serve two turns, both touching Sheppey, and also the Thames. For those, how many so ever they be, you may victual and furnish them daily and hourly; and then if we, serving here, may be remembered in time with victuals and things needful (which hath been sent for), I doubt not but her Highness shall lie quietly at Greenwich in despite of any he whatsoever.

I humbly pray you that ye will so consider of your commandment there, as you do not danger us here. I mean, for riding afore Dunkirk. For if we should ride where you would have us, and as my Lord Admiral advises, I dare assure your Honour it is ten to one that we shall be put to Flushing or at the least to Yarmouth, as divers of us were of late; and of some of them no news is heard as yet. And if we should be so put from thence, then we shall leave the gap open to our enemy. What danger and hurts our fleet incurred and sustained in the last storm which did put us from the other coast, I do think is not made known to your Honour and the rest of my Lords. I know there hath been such as hath promised and took upon him to make warrants to your Honour and the rest of my Lords, that he would ride thwart of Dunkirk all weathers, to avoid, to impeach, and let ¹ all passengers in and out; but I assure your Honours, his judgment and skill for that matter is neither grounded upon skill or reason, as I will be ready to prove it at all times.

I humbly beseech ² your Honour to let me know whether your Honour did send away my letter to my Lord Admiral which I wrote of late to his Lordship, and sent the same open to your Honour to peruse by my servant Roger. Thus in haste I most humbly take my leave, praying God to preserve your Lordship. Written in the seas midway between Folke-

After our hearty commendations :—Whereas we are informed that the Spanish ship lately taken and brought into Portland hath good store of powder, bullets, and other munition and furniture, fit to be employed in her Majesty's service, we have thought good to require you, calling unto you for your assistance, Francis Hawley, esquire, Vice-Admiral of those parts, to take a diligent view and perfect inventory of all such powder, bullets, and other things of worth that shall be found in the said ship, and carefully to be kept until you receive our further direction ; but for the powder, you may not fail, with all the speed possible, to convey the same to Dover on some little bark fit for that purpose. And touching the doubts delivered unto us by Captain Wye, we have sent our answer thereunto by way of apostilles² to your several demands. And so we bid you heartily farewell. After our hearty commendations unto your Lordship:—Where² you were directed by letters written by me, the Secretary, in her Majesty's name upon an advice given unto her Majesty by the Lord Admiral that you should presently repair and lie before the town of Dunkirk:—Forasmuch as her Majesty seeth how greatly it importeth her service to have somewhat done to distress the Spanish navy before they shall join with the Duke of Parma's forces by sea, her pleasure is that you should join with the Lord Admiral to do your best endeavour, being joined together, to distress the said army, to be executed in such sort as upon conference between our very good Lord the Lord Admiral and you shall be agreed on. And further her Majesty's pleasure is that we should signify unto you that there is order given for the supply of your wants of powder, men, and munition, which shall be so sufficiently performed as you shall find no lack that way. And so we bid your Lordship heartily farewell. At the Court the 28th of July, 1588.

July 28.—BOROUGH TO WALSYNGHAM.

[ccxiii. 57.—Signed. Addressed :—For her Majesty's service.
Much stained and partially obliterated by damp.]

Right Honourable :—The Lord Henry [Seymour hath] appointed me [yesterday] in the forenoon to come with the galley to the mouth of Thames, for guarding the river ; and his Lordship told me it was meant that certain ships should come speedily from London furnished in warlike manner for like purpose, whereof I should have the charge.

That day in the afternoon, as I purposed to have come from the Downs hitherwards, news was brought that the two armies were between Folkestone and Boulogne near the other coast ; whereupon with the ebb, the wind South-West, the Lord Harry with all his fleet plied to windwards, and before night for as high up as Scales Cliffs,¹ where I suppose they had sight of the fleets. I followed with the galley ; but ere I came half seas over, the wind forced me back into the Downs, where I remained all night ; and this morning, being little wind, I plied over towards Calais, in hope to have done some service if it had proved calm. When I was three parts of the seas over, I perceived the English fleet at anchor against Scales Cliffs,¹ and the Spanish at anchor between them and Calais. I could not fetch our [fleet] by [cause] of the leeward tide of flood, and therefore anchored ; but the wind at South-South-West increased so as we could not ride ; whereupon I weighed anchor, set sail and came room without the Goodwin Sand, to the North Foreland, and so longst up hither, where I anchored at 10 of the clock at night.

The pinnacle that lately carried the Council's letters to Flushing returned back this day, and is gone to my Lord Harry with letters of answer to his. The master of her told me that the Lord Governor of Flushing willed him to tell my Lord Harry that there should be 30 or 40 sail of good ships sent to him from thence very shortly. The said master supposed they would be ready this day or to-morrow ; but there was not one of their vessels abroad at sea. He told me further that he heard the mariners there use speeches that they would have their pay ere they went to the seas ; but I hope they will not stick upon it now.

If it shall be thought good to appoint me to farther charge, to command any of the ships that shall guard the river, what shall be directed me therein [I will] observe and perform dutifully, with God's help, whilst life lasteth. I do send herewith a rough plot of this river's mouth, with the channels and shoals in it, to the end I may be appointed in the same plot where the ships should remain. The channels for shipping to come into this river, I have signified in the same with the red lines,¹ by which your Honour may perceive how they concur at the east end of the Nore. And therefore I think it were good they should be placed on each side of the \odot where I now ride with the galley. Bylanders² and small hoys and boats may come in at half flood, as I have drawn the double lines with black lead.³

Richard Chester's tombstone in the church of Leigh records that he was Master of the Trinity House in 1615: that he lived in marriage with Elizabeth his wife about 49 years, by whom he had issue four sons and a daughter; and that he died April 6, 1632 (Barrett, The Trinity House of Deptford Strand, pp. 135-37, 140-41).

⁴ The Toby's demi-culverin is written in later, by the same hand, but in different ink. Whether it had the same allowance of shot as the other guns does not appear.

Besides this furniture, these ships are to have pikes, bills and swords sufficient, with convenient fireworks. As part of the great ordnance is imprested by warrant, so doth there want to furnish this proportion of small shot, 100 muskets, whereof it is humbly prayed they may be furnished out of her Majesty's store. It is purposed, if it may be, that all the men for these ships shall be mariners. But because thereof is no appearance, it is humbly prayed that Mr. Captain Bellingham may have warrant to furnish the want by press.

[ccxiii. 64.—Signed ; first postscript, autograph ; the second postscript, on a separate scrap of paper, is in the same writing as the letter. Addressed.]

Sir :—I have received your letter wherein you desire a proportion of shot and powder to be set down by me and sent unto you ; which, by reason of the uncertainty of the service, no man can do ; therefore I pray you to send with all speed as much as you can. And because some of our ships are victualled but for a very short time, and my Lord Henry Seymour with his company not for one day, in like¹ to pray you to dispatch away our victuals with all possible speed, because we know not whether we shall be driven to pursue the Spanish fleet.

This morning we drove a galleass ashore before Calais, whither I sent my long boat to board her, where divers of my men were slain, and my lieutenant² sore hurt in the taking of her. Ever since we have chased them in fight until this evening late, and distressed them much ; but their fleet consisteth of mighty ships and great strength ; yet we doubt not, by God's good assistance, to oppress them ; and so I bid you heartily farewell. From aboard her Majesty's good ship the Ark, the 29th of July, 1588.

Your very loving friend,
C. HOWARD.

Sir :—I will not write unto her Majesty before more be done. Their force is wonderful great and strong ; and yet we pluck their feathers by little and little. I pray to God that the forces on the land be strong enough to answer so present a force. There is not one Flushing nor Hollander at the seas.

Sir, I have taken the chief galleass this day before Calais, with the loss of divers of my men ; but Monsieur Gourdan doth detain her, as I hear say. I could not send unto him, because I was in fight ; therefore I pray you to write unto him, either to deliver her, or at leastwise to promise upon his honour that he will not yield her up again unto the enemy.

July 29.—DRAKE TO WALSYNGHAM.

[ccxiii. 65.—Holograph. Addressed.]

Right Honourable :—This bearer came aboard the ship I was in in a wonderful good time, and brought with him as good knowledge as we could wish. His carefulness therein is worthy recompense, for that God hath given us so good a day in forcing the enemy so far to leeward as I hope in God the Prince of Parma and the Duke of Sidonia shall not shake hands this few days ; and whensoever they shall meet, I believe neither of them will greatly rejoice of this day's service. The town of Calais hath seen some part thereof, whose Mayor her Majesty is beholden unto. Business commands me to end. God bless her Majesty, our gracious Sovereign, and give us all grace to live in his fear. I assure your Honour this day's service hath much appalled the enemy, and no doubt but¹ encouraged our army. From aboard her Majesty's good ship the Revenge, this 29th of July, 1588.

Your Honour's most ready to be commanded,
FRA. DRAKE.

There must be great care taken to send us munition and victual whithersoever the enemy goeth.
Yours,
FRA. DRAKE.

July 30.—ROBERT CECILL TO LORD BURGHLEY.

[ccxiii. 66.—Holograph. Addressed.]

My duty remembered to your Lordship:—Although this bearer's letter to Mr. Secretary will thoroughly advertise your Lordship, yet with remembrance of my duty, I thought good to acquaint you with that which I have heard of a Spanish gentleman taken yesterday in one of the galleasses, which was run ashore at Calais, and there is seized by Monsr. Gourdan. The captain of this ship, named Moncada, one of the greatest personages in the fleet, was killed with a small shot of a musket that pierced both his eyes. The second of account in that ship is taken and kept in one of the ships in her Majesty's fleet. This man that is here is a proper gentleman of Salamanca, who affirmeth that there is great lack imputed to the Duke of Parma, in that he hath not joined with this fleet which hath lingered about Calais and Gravelines of purpose for him, and would not have stirred from those roads, if the device of the fireworks on Sunday had not forced them to slip their anchors and so make head away, in which instant my Lord Admiral gave them that fight which we saw upon the land yesterday ; where, as terrible as it was in appearance, there was few men hurt with any shot, nor any one vessel sunk. For, as this man reporteth, they shoot very far off ; and for boarding, our men have not any reason.

It is to be thought that Monsr. Gourdan will hardly part with this ship to her Majesty's use ; and if he do not relieve her, and send them her again, yet it is the less harm. He sent, they say, a kind message to my Lord Admiral concerning it, which I am sure your Lordship is advertised of.

The opinion of this gentleman is that from Scotland they shall have aid ; and for their own parts, he told me, they would think it sufficient if they could but draw away our fleet to the northward, thereby hoping tenere il mare netto, whereby, without impeachment, the Duke of Parma's men might land here ; who, as he understandeth, is not in readiness ; for his soldiers are yet unshipped, and as it is thought the Zealanders lie in the mouth of the haven to impeach their putting forth.

The powder your Lordship sent hither yesterday is gone now to our fleet in the Roebuck, which Sir W. Raleigh built, which is a fine ship and well furnished. Of my Lord of Derby I can hear nothing ; wherefore I have determined to leave order here to be advertised immediately upon his arrival, that I may meet his Lordship from London upon the way, where I think to be to-morrow or next day, if the wind turn not to bring the ships upon this coast again. From Dover this 30th of July, 1588, at 12 of clock. I most humbly take my leave of your Lordship. In haste,

Your most obedient son,
ROBT. CECILL.

*July 30.—RICHARD TOMSON¹ TO WAL-

[ccxiii. 67.—Holograph.]

Since our first meeting of our enemies, which was on Sunday the 21st of this present, we have had four encounters such as, the Lord be praised, hath not a little daunted the minds of our enemies, but much impaired their great and unexpected forces, and to very little or no detriment of our English navy. At our first meeting of them, which was within two miles of Looe in Cornwall, they were 136 sail of ships and pinnaces, whereof 90 were very great ships, and the rest of smaller account; and at that time our English navy was not above 67 sail. By God's goodness and the good working of our commanders, we got the wind of them, which is a very great advantage and a special safety for the weaker part ; and ever since, God hath so blessed us that we have kept the same, to the great annoyance of our enemies ; and by that means, we have so daily pursued them at the heels, that they never had leisure to stop in any place amongst our English coast, until they came within two miles of Calais, where in the evening, very politicly, they came all upon a sudden to an anchor, being Saturday the 27th day, purposing that our ships with the flood should be driven to leeward of them ; but in happy time it was soon espied, and prevented by bringing our fleet to an anchor also in the wind of them.

¹ Lieutenant of the Margaret and John of London; not probably a brother of Lawrence Tomson, Walsyngham's servant or secretary. He had been for some years engaged in the Mediterranean trade, which, in 1582 and following years, had brought him into litigation with the Turkey Company. In 1583 he had made a voyage to Algiers to ransom captives. In September 1588 he was employed in arranging the ransom of the Spanish prisoners. At the end of the century he was living in London, writing occasional letters to Sir Robert Cecyll, then Secretary of State. He appears to have been a man of some education, conversant with French and Spanish, and may possibly have been a son of that Robert Tomson of Andover and Seville mentioned in the Introduction, though other indications seem to connect him with Norfolk.

The same night sent¹ ashore to Calais and forthwith to the Duke of Parma, advertising of their being there ; and one received answer that he with his forces would be in readiness upon Tuesday following, and come and join with them, with intent to come over and land their forces in England, about Margate² in Kent, as since I have thoroughly learned of the Spaniards that were taken in the chief galleass that the King had, hard under the jetty head at Calais. It hath appeared by many arguments that they Spaniards were not evil welcome to Monsieur Gourdan and the rest of his government, by permitting their messengers to go so speedily between the Duke and that place, as also by suffering the boats to go to and from the shore so usually, all Sunday the 28th of July, as they did ; and most of all, by sending his kinsman and lieutenant aboard the Duke of Medina with a great present ; whereof no semblance was made at all unto our Lord Admiral.

It pleased my Lord Admiral to appoint certain small ships to be fired on Sunday about 12 of the clock at night, and let drive with the flood amongst the Spaniards; which practice, God be thanked, hath since turned to our great good; for it caused they Spaniards to let slip their anchors and cables, and confusedly to drive one upon another; whereby they were not only put from their roadstead and place where they meant to attend the coming of the Duke of Parma, but did much hurt one to another of themselves; and¹ now by the earnest pursuit of our Englishmen, very much weakened and dispersed, the Lord be praised; so that of the 124 sail that they were in Calais Road, we cannot now find by any account above 86 ships and pinnaces; so that I cannot conjecture but by the furious assault that my Lord and his associates gave them early on Monday morning, and did continue in vehement manner 8 hours, hath laid² many of them in the bottom of the sea, or else run with the coast of Flanders to save their lives, though impossible to save their great ships, by reason of their evil harbours.

At the break of day upon Monday morning, my Lord and all the fleet setting sail after our enemies, we espied riding within shot of the town of Calais the greatest of the King's galleasses, the rest of the Spanish fleet being two leagues to leeward of her. My Lord Admiral began to go toward the galleass with his ship, the Ark, but finding the water to be shallow, other ships of less draught bare in with her and shot at her; whereupon she let slip and run the galleass aground hard before the town.

In our ship, which was the Margaret and John of London, we approached so near that we came on ground also; but afterwards came safely off again with the flood, being damaged by nothing but by the town of Calais, who, off the bulwarks, shot very much at us, and shot our ship twice through. And the like powder and shot did Monsieur Gourdan bestow upon sundry of our countrymen, and make us relinquish the galleass, which otherwise we had brought away, being masters of her above two hours, and gotten by hard assault, to the great credit of our country, if Monsieur Gourdan herein had not showed his affection to the Spaniards to be greater than our nation, or seemed by force to wrest from us that which we had gotten with bloody heads.

My Lord Admiral, seeing he could not approach the galleass with his ship, sent off his long boat unto her with 50 or 60 men, amongst whom were many gentlemen as valiant in courage as gentle in birth, as they well showed. The like did our ship send off her pinnace, with certain musketeers, amongst whom myself went. These two boats came hard under the galleass sides, being aground; where we continued a pretty skirmish with our small shot against theirs, they being ensconced within their ship and very high over us, we in our open pinnaces and far under them, having nothing to shroud and cover us; they being 300 soldiers, besides 450 slaves, and we not, at the instant, 100 persons. Within one half hour it pleased God, by killing the captain with a musket shot, to give us victory above all hope or expectation; for the soldiers leaped overboard by heaps on the other side, and fled with the shore, swimming and wading. Some escaped with being wet; some, and that very many, were drowned. The captain of her was called Don Hugo de Moncada,¹ son to the viceroy of Valencia. He being slain, and the most part of their soldiers fled, some few soldiers remaining in her, seeing our English boats under her sides and more of ours coming rowing towards her, some with 10 and some with 8 men in them, for all the smallest shipping were the nearest the shore, put up two handkerchiefs¹ upon two rapiers, signifying that they desired truce. Hereupon we entered, with much difficulty, by reason of her height over us, and possessed us of her, by the space of an hour and half as I judge; each man seeking his benefit of pillage until the flood came, that we might haul her off the ground and bring her away.

It may please your Honour to understand that during our fight to get her, the men of Calais stood in multitudes upon the shore hard by us and beholding all things, showing themselves at that instant indifferent lookers-on; but so soon as they saw us possessed of so princely a vessel, the very glory and stay of the Spanish army, a thing of very great value and strength, as was well known to them of Calais, for that they had been on board twice or thrice the day before; I say, Monsieur Gourdan, seeing us thus² possessed, sent aboard to us that were in her, in which boat came his kinsman and another captain, desiring to parle³ with us. None being then in place that either understood or spake French but myself, I asked them from whom they came. They⁴ answered, from Monsieur Gourdan, the Governor of Calais. I demanded to know what his pleasure was. They answered that he had stood and beheld our fight and rejoiced of our victory, saying that for our prowess and manhood showed therein we had well deserved the spoil and pillage of the galleass, as a thing due unto us by desert; and that he willingly consented that we should have the pillage of her; further requiring and commanding us not to offer to carry away either the ship or ordnance, for that she was on ground under the commandment of his castles and town, and therefore did of right appertain unto him. I answered unto them that, for our parts, we thanked Monsieur Gourdan for granting the pillage to the mariners and soldiers that had fought for the same; acknowledging that without his leave and good will we could not carry away anything of that we had gotten, considering it lay on ground hard under his bulwarks; and that as concerning the ship and ordnance, we prayed it would please him to send a pinnace aboard my Lord Admiral, who was here in person hard by, from whom he should have an honourable and friendly answer which we all are to obey and give place unto. With this answer, to my seeming they departed well satisfied; but since I have understood that some of our rude men, who make no account of friend or foe, fell to spoiling the Frenchmen, taking away their rings and jewels as from enemies; whereupon¹ going ashore and complaining, all the bulwarks and ports were bent against us, and shot so vehemently that we received sundry shot very dangerously through us. If this have not incensed Monsieur Gourdan, I suppose that he will easily, upon request made, either surrender all or the better part of all things unto her Majesty; for the ship cannot be so little worth, with her ordnance, as eighty thousand crowns; having in her four whole cannons, 8 demi-cannons, 12 culverins and demi-culverins, 16 sakers and minions, all of brass, 200 barrels of powder, and of all other things great provision and plenty; but very little or no treasure that I can learn to be in her.

This is the substance and very truth of all that passed in this action. Being thus departed from the galleasses, my Lord with all the fleet pursued the enemy, with all violent pursuit that our ordnance and small shot could yield ; little to our hurt, the Lord be praised, but greatly to the detriment of the enemy, as the bearer hereof, Mr. John Watts¹ of London, can amply inform your Honour ; for he was present at the doing of most of these things happened within these two days, not without danger enough of his person both of cannon and musket shot, whereof his apparel beareth some tokens, although it pleased God to spare his life. At this instant we are as far to the eastward as the Isle of Walcheren, wherein Flushing doth stand, and about 12 leagues off the shore ; and the wind hanging westerly, we drive our enemies apace to the eastward, much marvelling, if the wind continue, in what port they will direct themselves. Some imagine the river of Hamburg, which is a bad place for the receipt of ships of such charge ; others suppose, because they have yet provision of victuals for three months, they will about Scotland, and so for Spain. I trust her Majesty may, by God's help, little fear any invasion by these ships ; their power being, by battle, mortality, and other accidents, so decayed, and those that are left alive so weak and hurtless, that they could be well content to lose all charges to be at home, both rich and poor. There is want of powder, shot and victual, amongst us, which causeth that we cannot so daily assault them as we would. God grant the want may in time be supplied that so necessary a service be not neglected thereby. Thus I take my humble leave of your Honour, to whom Almighty God send all continuance of health and increase of happiness. Subscribed, RICHARD TOMSON.

July 31.—KYLLYGREW TO WALSYNGHAM.

[Holland, lv.—Signed, and autograph postscript. Addressed.]

It may please your Honour:—I could not let your Honour's own servant pass without some few lines, having at this present no great matter to write.

My Lord Governor of Flushing sent me of late a letter from my Lords of the Council unto him for the soliciting of the States of Holland to furnish out what shipping they could withal spare; wherein, as his Lordship hath moved them there, so here I have also done the like; and I understand the Admiral Justinus is gone out already with thirty sail from Flushing, besides some other which are presently to follow from those parts and North Holland, so as I doubt not her Majesty's fleet will be strong enough, especially the merchants being now returned from Stade and St. Nicholas,¹ as we understand. But, as I have signified unto your Honour heretofore, for any great assistance to be had from hence, it is not to be looked for at their hands. Their troubles and mutinies here have brought them so low, especially this last of Gertruidenberg, which hath cost them 215,000 fl., for the supplying whereof they have been fain to stretch their credits to the uttermost. So having moved them (according to your Honour's instructions sent unto me by Burnham) for the raising of some extraordinary contributions, I find no means to effectuate the same, considering as they say their extraordinary charges this year arise, through their preparations at sea, to a greater sum than many years heretofore, and that especially her Majesty's letter to them of Gertruidenberg was very acceptable to these men, as assuring them of her Highness' honourable meaning towards them ; but coming now, as it did, too late, they think it not convenient to deliver it.

For your Honour's letter to my Lord General¹ touching the articles² of peace, it was also very good news unto them, and my Lord hath dealt for the publishing thereof: but for the finding out of the authors of such malicious slanders, they have no other means than to learn of the Count William³ (who sent the same out of Friesland to the Count Maurice) and of my Lord Governor of Flushing (from whom also I received a like copy) from whence they came into their hands. To the Count William, the Council of State will write to that effect; and to my Lord Governor of Flushing, I have done the like. They are in hand to dispatch away Sir Martin Schenk⁴ towards Bergen with some horse and foot for the relief thereof, and to furnish him with a bond of 30,000 fl. upon their credit, to be paid after the enterprise is achieved. Some of our horsemen lying thereabout in the garrisons adjoining are to be drawn out to this service.

The controversies of Utrecht are not yet ended,

² Certain articles, alleged to be the basis of the negotiations for the treaty, had been published. They excited great indignation in Holland and Zealand, and were now vehemently denied on the part of the Queen.

He was knighted by Leicester in 1586, and after many valiant deeds was drowned by the sinking of his boat in 1589. A lively, but perhaps highly coloured, picture of the man and his exploits is given by Motley in the second volume of his History of the United Netherlands.

and rather grow worse and worse by reason of a request presented by the gentlemen of late, which hath made those of Utrecht more backward than before. In mine opinion it were not amiss if it might please her Majesty to address her letters unto them, requiring them in regard of the common cause to lay down their particularities.¹ For the 1,000 shot² to be sent over, my Lord General is very careful to dispatch them away presently, and to that end doth now repair into Zealand. Thus in haste, I most humbly recommend myself to your Honour's good remembrance, craving pardon for my rudeness. At the Hague, the 31st of July, 1588.

Your Honour's most assuredly to be commanded,

H. KYLLYGREW.

I can but pray to God against the power and malice of Satan, for here there will be little more aid come than you have had. They make duty³ to suffer any of her Majesty's people to return, because they stand in so great need themselves. Yet have they been dealt withal by all manner of persuasion. Their anchor hold is the treaty, and their towns in her Majesty's possession and the inability⁴ they stand in to furnish Bergen and Ostend with any of theirs, who cashier⁵ of their own daily, for want of means to keep them; and sure if there come no money over to pay our companies their lendings, there will fall out great inconvenience, for here I see no relief to be had for them, unless some letters be written to our merchants at Middelburg to supply their needs at a pinch. My Lords may do well to advise upon this point, and under correction, the drawing of so many out of Flushing may prove more dangerous than by taking the whole number from Ostend.

I hear of great preparation in England to fight, but if London were trenched about as Paris was, it were a retreat in all events, and the only¹ way thought by good soldiers to break all the enemy's designs to his utter ruin. Many hands will make light work. The Lord of all power show us mercy.

These men are moved to set forth more ships, by name one that came from carrying² the Count Hohenlo to Hamburg [and]³ the wafters of the herring fleet newly come home. We have also moved the Count Maurice and the Council to go into Zealand, but yet the matter is in dispute, and will not be resolved this week by the States General who be here yet assembled.

I heard nothing out of England since the 11th of this present. Sir Thomas Morgan doth come over with the 2,000 shot, and hath been able to prevail in nothing here; yet have I done for him what I could, though small thanks for my labour. I thank your Honour for remembering of Mr Gilpin; I trust her Majesty shall receive good service by him. I write to no man at this time but to your Honour, and therefore it may please you to impart what your Honour shall think good.

July 31.—MEMORIAL FOR RICHARD DRAKE.

[ccxiii. 69.]

St. James, the last of July, 1588.

A memorial for Richard Drake, Esquire, being sent to the Lord Admiral, of such things as her Majesty doth desire to be informed of.

² MS. caring.

³ Omitted in MS.

To be enquired :—

What number of ships are in service with my Lord Admiral, and of what burden ?

How many are of the Queen's own ships ? how many of them are ships of good bulk ? how many are pinnaces, and how many of the country's charge ?

What number of soldiers and of mariners serve in the Queen's ships ?

How the Queen's ships are victualled ?

How the other ships are victualled ?

What powder and shot every ship hath ?

How much powder and shot doth the navy use to spend in the fights with the enemies upon one day ?

What quantity of powder and bullet hath been brought to the navy since the Lord Admiral met with the Spanish fleet near Plymouth ? And from what places hath it been brought to the navy ?

What losses of men and ships hath been on the Spanish side ? and where were the losses ? and where are the prisoners ? And what powder, munition and any treasure hath been taken upon them ? What losses hath happened to the Queen's army of ships and men ?

What men hath been lost since the beginning of the services at Plymouth ?

What causes are there why the Spanish navy hath not been boarded by the Queen's ships ? And though some of the ships of Spain may be thought too huge to be boarded by the English, yet some of the Queen's ships are thought very able to have boarded divers of the meaner ships of the Spanish navy.¹

taken, shall find it more necessary to have those ten ships¹ to be used upon the coast of Flanders to imbarke² the Duke of Parma's shipping there, then, upon his commandment, the said ten ships shall repair to such place for that service as he shall appoint.

The Queen's Majesty would have Pedro de Valdes, that was the captain of the galleon distressed, to be sent safe into England; and such other Spaniards as have been taken and are now kept on seaboard; for that she thinketh very inconvenient to have any such kept upon any English ship, where either they may practise some mischief, or else come to understanding of the secrets of the services intended.

To inform the Lord Admiral that some Englishmen, and Spaniards also that are taken, do say that the intent of the Spanish navy is to draw along the English navy from the coast of Flanders; that the sea being clear, the Duke of Parma might come out with his forces to invade the realm, and namely to come to London. Some also do think that if this navy of Spain cannot prevail against the English, that they will sail to the river of Emden; whereof the Lord Admiral may see well to inform himself what may be probable to think thereof.

The Lord Steward,³ who was at Dover the 29th of July, saith that a Hollander came to Dover declaring that he came in company with 30 or 40 sail of Hollanders, and came to the Spanish fleet in the night unawares, the night before when the fire was put by English boats, and that in the morning those Hollanders came to the Lord Admiral and joined with his navy. But by reason the Lord Admiral's letters ¹ written the 30th of this month reporteth that there was no Hollander nor Londoner upon the sea, it is to be enquired what may be thought thereof, and to enquire how the mouth of the Sluys is kept by any ships of Zealand, where it is said the Duke mindeth to set out a number of his bylanders.

You shall seek to learn the state of our commissioners at Bourbourg, whether they be come thence, and to what place, and with what surety they may come into England.

If any words can be sent to Sir Wm. Russell, to require him to send away 20 lasts of powder, and that if he may, some 8 or 10 lasts thereof may, in the way, be sent to the Lord Admiral.

July 31.—GORGES TO WALSYNGHAM.

[ccxiii. 70.—Signed. Addressed.]

Right Honourable :—According to your direction have done my endeavour, all that might be, for the coming to my Lord Henry Seymour with the eight ships of London ; and on the 30th of July, passing through the sands, we were becalmed and forced to anchor the same night in the New Channel. The next morning, being the last of this month, we had the wind at South-East and blew very much, so that by no means we could recover the North Foreland. And thus riding in the New Channel we understood by a ketch that both the fleets weighed anchor on Sunday at night, and fell presently into fight, and so continued till they were out of sight of land plying to the North-East ; but what course they have taken, as yet we cannot learn. But I mean with all diligence to ply into the Narrow Seas, to understand whether my Lord Henry hath left any order what I shall do ; and if there be order left for my service there, I mean to ply after the fleet with all possible means I can make. And thus, with my humble duty, I wish you increase of honour with all happiness. From aboard the Susan Parnell, at ten of the clock, this last of July.

¹ No letter of Howard's, of this date, is now known. It may be that it was read and re-read and handed about till it fell to pieces ; but the reference is, more probably, to the letter to Walsyngham of the 29th (ante, p. 341), which says no Hollander nor Flushing. And in fact, there were, within Howard's knowledge, many London ships at sea—the Margaret and John among others—though Gorges was still in the river.

July 31.—HAWKYNS TO WALSYNGHAM.

My bounden duty humbly remembered unto your good Lordship:—I have not busied myself to write often to your Lordship in this great cause, for that my Lord Admiral doth continually advertise the manner of all things that doth pass. So do others that understand the state of all things as well as myself. We met with this fleet somewhat to the westward of Plymouth upon Sunday in the morning, being the 21st of July, where we had some small fight with them in the afternoon. By the coming aboard one of the other of the Spaniards, a great ship, a Biscayan, spent her foremast and bowsprit ; which was left by the fleet in the sea, and so taken up by Sir Francis Drake the next morning. The same Sunday there was, by a fire chancing by a barrel of powder, a great Biscayan spoiled and abandoned, which my Lord took up and sent away.

The Tuesday following, athwart of Portland, we had a sharp and long fight with them, wherein we spent a great part of our powder and shot, so as it was not thought good to deal with them any more till that was relieved.

The Thursday following, by the occasion of the scattering¹ of one of the great ships from the fleet, which we hoped to have cut off, there grew a hot fray, wherein some store of powder was spent; and after that, little done till we came near to Calais, where the fleet of Spain anchored, and our fleet by them; and because they should not be in peace there, to refresh their water or to have conference with those of the Duke of Parma's party, my Lord Admiral, with firing of ships, determined to remove them; as he did, and put them to the seas; in which broil the chief galleass spoiled her rudder, and so rode ashore near the town of Calais, where she was possessed of our men, but so aground as she could not be brought away.

That morning, being Monday, the 29th of July, we followed the Spaniards; and all that day had with them a long and great fight, wherein there was great valour showed generally of our company. In this battle there was spent very much of our powder and shot; and so the wind began to blow westerly, a fresh gale, and the Spaniards put themselves somewhat to the northward, where we follow and keep company with them. In this fight there was some hurt done among the Spaniards. A great ship of the galleons of Portugal, her rudder spoiled, and so the fleet left her in the sea. I doubt not but all these things are written more at large to your Lordship than I can do ; but this is the substance and material matter that hath passed.

Our ships, God be thanked, have received little hurt, and are of great force to accompany them, and of such advantage that with some continuance at the seas, and sufficiently provided of shot and powder, we shall be able, with God's favour, to weary them out of the sea and confound them. Yet, as I gather certainly, there are amongst them 50 forcible and invincible ships which consist of those that follow, viz. :—

Nine galleons of Portugal of 800 ton apiece, saving two of them are but 400 ton apiece.

Twenty great Venetians and argosies of the seas within the Strait, of 800 apiece.

One ship of the Duke of Florence of 800 ton.

Twenty great Biscayans of 500 or 600 ton.

Four galleasses, whereof one is in France.

There are 30 hulks, and 30 other small ships, whereof little account is to be made.

At their departing from Lisbon, being the 19th of May by our account, they were victualled for six months. They stayed in the Groyne twenty-eight days, and there refreshed their water. At their coming from Lisbon they were taken with a flaw, and fourteen hulks or thereabouts came near Ushant, and so returned with contrary winds to the Groyne, and there met ; and else there was none other company upon our coast before the whole fleet arrived. And in their coming now, a little flaw took them, fifty leagues from the coast of Spain ; where one great ship was severed from them, and four galleys, which hitherto have not recovered their company.

At their departing from Lisbon, the soldiers were twenty thousand, the mariners and others eight thousand ; so as, in all, they were twenty-eight thousand men. Their commission was to confer with the Prince of Parma, as I learn, and then to proceed to the service that should be there concluded; and so the Duke to return into Spain with these ships and mariners, the soldiers and their furniture being left behind. Now this fleet is here, and very forcible, and must be waited upon with all our force, which is little enough. There would¹ be an infinite quantity of powder and shot provided, and continually sent abroad; without the which great hazard may grow to our country; for this is the greatest and strongest combination, to my understanding, that ever was gathered in Christendom; therefore I wish it, of all hands, to be mightily and diligently looked unto and cared for.

The men have been long unpaid and need relief. I pray your Lordship that the money that should have gone to Plymouth may now be sent to Dover. August now cometh in, and this coast will spend ground tackle, cordage, canvas and victuals; all which would be sent to Dover in good plenty. With these things, and God's blessing, our kingdom may be preserved; which being neglected, great hazard may come. I write to your Lordship briefly and plainly. Your wisdom and experience is great; but this is a matter far passing all that hath been seen in our time or long before. And so praying to God for a happy deliverance from the malicious and dangerous practice of our enemies, I humbly take my leave. From the sea, aboard the Victory, the last of July, 1588.

The Spaniards take their course for Scotland; my Lord doth follow them. I doubt not, with God's favour, but we shall impeach their landing. There must be order for victual and money, powder and shot, to be sent after us.

Your Lordship's humbly to command,
JOHN HAWKINS.

This is the copy of the letter I send to my Lord Treasurer, whereby I shall not need to write to your Honour. Help us with furniture, and, with God's favour, we shall confound their devices.

Your Honour's ever bounden,

JOHN HAWKYNS.

I pray your Honour bear with this, for it is done in haste and bad weather.

July 31.—BARREY TO WALSYNGHAM.

[ccxiii. 72.—Signed. Addressed.]

My most humble duty unto your Honour remembered:—Upon Sunday last Sir Henry Palmer came unto Dover from the Lord Admiral for some of the boats that were appointed to be laden with bavens¹ and pitch, and had presently away with him that night 19 boats of the ports laden with bavens; and every boat one barrel of pitch of their own, besides the 72 barrels sent down by your Honour, the which were sent in one of those boats. Sir Henry Palmer embarked himself in one of those boats, and departed from Dover on Sunday night last, about 12 of the clock. Before Sir Henry Palmer's coming unto my Lord Admiral, there was an attempt made by other vessels for the firing of the Spanish fleet; by which means the fleet was removed from the road before Calais, and so are passed towards the North Seas, and all her Majesty's navy in chase of them. And I hope in the Almighty God, he will give good success unto our navy.

bavens are returned from my Lord Admiral, who say that my Lord discharged them, But, for that it may be shift of wind may put back the fleet again, I make stay of all the boats that are here, as well of those that are returned as of the rest that were not yet sent forth.

Yesternight, about 6 of the clock, Jasper Swift¹ came unto me and showed me an order from your Honour for certain boats that should come unto Dover, which are not yet come, not above 3 of them; and if the Spanish fleet return not, here will be no use of them. The ports' men² deserve commendation for their willing readiness; for within one day after they received letters from me, with your Honour's letter, they sent 30 boats into this harbour. If there shall not be any further employment of them, may it please your Honour to signify your Honour's pleasure therein; for they are most of them fishermen of Rye and Hastings, and lie here at great charges, calling upon me every day to victual them. I gave my bills for victualling those that were sent with Sir Henry Palmer, as also for the bavens that were taken up, and the pitch that they brought in their own boats; and money also disbursed by me for sending to the ships and for labourers and boats in shipping of the bavens; most humbly beseeching your Honour that order may be taken by your good means for the satisfying thereof, the particulars whereof by my next I will send unto your Honour; and so I most humbly cease from troubling of your Honour. At Dover Castle, this last of July, 1588.

Your Honour's always most bounden

RYCHARD BARREY.

July 31.—DRAKE TO WALSYNGHAM.

[ccxiii. 73.—Holograph. Addressed.]

Most Honourable :—I am commanded to send these prisoners ashore by my Lord Admiral, which had ere this been long done, but that I thought their being here might have done something which is not thought meet now.

Let me beseech your Honour that they may be presented unto her Majesty, either by your Honour, or by my honourable good Lord, my Lord Chancellor, or both of ye. The one Don Pedro is a man of greatest estimation with the King of Spain, and thought next in his army to the Duke of Sidonia. If they should be given from¹ me unto any other, it would be some grief to my friends. If her Majesty will have them, God defend² but I should think it happy.

We have the army of Spain before us and mind, with the grace of God, to wrestle a pull³ with him. There was never anything pleased me better than the seeing the enemy flying with a southerly wind to the northwards. God grant you have a good eye to the Duke of Parma ; for with the grace of God, if we live, I doubt it not but ere it be long so to handle the matter with the Duke of Sidonia as he shall wish himself at St. Mary Port among his orange trees.⁴

⁴ Cf. Nelson to Addington, 12th of August, 1801 : 'In my command I find much zeal and good humour ; and should Mr. Bonaparte put himself in our way, I believe he will wish himself even in Corsica.' The coincidence is only one of many which occur in Nelson's letters, and raise the suspicion that he had read much more than is commonly supposed.

God give us grace to depend upon him ; so shall we not doubt victory, for our cause is good.
Humbly taking my leave, this last of July, 1588,

Your Honour's faithfully to be commanded ever,

FRA. DRAKE.

I crave pardon of your Honour for my haste, for that I had to watch this last night upon the enemy.

Yours ever, .

FRA. DRAKE.

PRESIDENT

EARL SPENCER, K.G.

THE NAVY RECORDS SOCIETY, which has been established for the purpose of printing rare or unpublished works of naval interest, aims at rendering accessible the sources of our naval history and at elucidating questions of naval archæology, construction, administration, organisation and social life.

For this year, the Society will issue the two volumes of State Papers relating to the Defeat of the Spanish Armada, edited by Professor Laughton.

For next year, the volumes will probably be :—

Letters of the first Lord Hood from the West Indies in 1781-2, edited by Mr. David Hannay ; and

A Memoir of Captain Stephen Martin, the brother-in-law and companion in arms of Sir John Leake, written by his son, Stephen Martin Leake, edited by Mr. Clements Markham.

Other volumes in preparation are :—

The Journal of Rear-Admiral Bartholomew James, during the Wars of American Independence and the French Revolution, to be edited by Commander J. Y. F. Sullivan ; and Mr. Holland's Two Discourses on the Navy, written about 1639 and 1660, to be edited by Mr. J. R. Tanner.

Any person wishing to become a Member of the Society is requested to apply to the Secretary (Professor Laughton, Catesby House, Manor Road, Barnet), who will submit his name to the Council. The Annual Subscription is One Guinea, the payment of which entitles the Member to receive one copy of all works issued by the Society for that year.
